Sir Jonah Barrington does not stick at pulling the long bow to a considerable extent, and it is not always easy to determine where the truth ends and the fiction begins, or even to separate from the substratum the embellishments with which it is presented to the reader. Life in Ireland, as Sir Jonah represents it, seems to have been one long scene of jovial, headlong, three-quarters blundering and one quarter shrewd horse-play. We have the account, told with much detail of the writer's great-aunt being besieged in her castle by the warriors of a neighbouring tribe, and holding it stoutly and successfully, at the cost only of her husband, of whom she observed, that she might get another husband, but never could get another castle. While a boy, Sir Jonah assisted at a singular bout of "hard going." It was resolved that during a long frost which stopped hunting a party should shut themselves up in the huntsman's cottage with the carcass of a cow, a hog-head of claret, some fowls, bacon and bread, two pipers and a fiddler; which accordingly was done. The windows were stopped up to shut out the light, one room was filled with straw and blankets as a common bed-room, while another served as the kitchen, and so the hard-goers kept it up, eating, drinking, sleeping, and cock-fighting, till on the seventh morning the cow was done, and the claret on the stoop. A chapter is devoted to duelling and the Galway rules, and Sir Jonah gives a long list of duels fought by judicial and official antagonists, though in most cases before their elevation to the bench—thus,

"The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Earl Clare, fought the Master of the Rolls, Curran.

"Nudge, Baron of the Exchequer, fought his brother-in-law and two others.

"The Chief Justice, Common Pleas, Lord Norbury, fought Fire-eater Fitzgerald and two other gentlemen, and frightened Napper Tandy and several others; only one hit.

"The judge of the Prerogative Court, Dr. Duigenan, fought one barrister and frightened another on the ground.

"The Chief Counsel to the Revenue, Henry Deane Grady, fought Counsellor O'Mahon, Counsellor Campbell, and others; all hits, &c., &c., &c."

"I think," says Sir Jonah, "I may challenge any country in Europe to show such an assemblage of gallant judicial and official antagonists at fire and sword as is exhibited even in this list." We think he may. Of course Sir Jonah goes through his own share of the performance. According to his account the duello seems to have been incorporated into the common law procedure, its use being twofold. If your adversary had retained a dangerous man, your remedy was either to challenge him and shoot him yourself, or get your own attorney or counsel to do so. You might also resort to a challenge as in the nature of an appeal, when smarting under the mortification of an adverse decision. One of Sir Jonah's best clients, hampered in a long and determined series of litigation by some legal technicalities, determined "to fight it out, muzzle to muzzle, with the attorney and all the counsel on the other side," and proceeded to carry out his determination with alternate challenges from himself and his sons, beginning with one to the defendant's attorney, who promptly accepted the invitation. At length, however, this persevering litigant, "finding that neither the laws of the land nor those of battle were likely to adjust affairs to his satisfaction, suffered them to be terminated by three duels and as many wounds." As we have said, it is not always easy to say where Sir Jonah's facts end and his embellishments begin; perhaps some of his most incredible relations are among the truest; the whole complexion of the book is probably a genuine reflex of Irish character.

However this may be, the book is certainly a most entertaining one, and we cordially recommend it to our readers as an enjoyable piece of reading. The editor of the present edition has thought fit to persecute his author page after page with foot-notes, in which he presents his own comments on the text. These foot-notes are the most unaccountable pieces of composition we ever remember to have suffered from; their literary value is about on a par with that of the annotations with which persevering scholiasts adorn the leaves of Mr. Mudie's volumes; and the utter absence on the part of their writer of all faculty for appreciating humour must render him one of the most extraordinary individuals extant. The annotations are also insufferably conceited. They are, however, no drawback to the book, since no one is obliged to read them; and we must not forget that we have to thank their author for reprinting these inexpressibly entertaining Sketches. The work has been very well got up by the printer, and will be found very pleasant reading for tired lawyers.

KINGSTON.

(Before the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE and a Special Jury.)

April 2.—Elworthy v. Milliken

Mr. Serjeant Parry and Mr. Joyce appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Pollock, Q.C., and Mr. Arthur Wilson, for the defendant.

This was an action against the proprietor of the Solicitors' Journal and Reporter for an alleged libel published in that journal. The damages were laid at £2,000.

Mr. Joyce having opened the pleadings,

Mr. Serjeant Parry said—May it please your Lordship, gentlemen of the jury—the plaintiff in this case is a solicitor, and he complains of a libel which has been published against him in a journal which I am free to say is of the highest respectability, and has a large circulation amongst our profession, called the Solicitors' Journal and Reporter. I am happy, however, to inform you that you will not be troubled with any inquiry in this case. The nature of the libel which Mr. Elworthy complained of is this—that, having established in Greenwich with his father an association called the West Kent Legal and Mercantile Institute, the Solicitors' Journal, in commenting upon that association, has undoubtedly said—I think that is what is complained of—that the Law Institution should have their eye upon it; and it has said of him that which he feels he ought to complain of. But, gentlemen, I have consulted with my learned friend Mr. Pollock, who appears for the Solicitors' Journal, and I believe he is ready to endorse what I am about to say to you. This institute was established in September, 1869, and since then it has been the means of collecting many debts due to the tradespeople in the neighbourhood of Greenwich. I believe that Mr. Elworthy was much employed in behalf of the creditors of Lord Mahon and Sir William Parker, with reference to the election; he was employed by them to recover certain amounts, and he did recover those amounts, and paid them over to the parties who were entitled to the sums of money that he recovered. I may mention to you that an association of this kind is not looked upon with favour by the profession, and I am not at all here to say that if the Solicitors' Journal thought that there was anything at all improper about an association of this kind, it would not have a right to freely and fairly comment upon it; but when I informed my friend, Mr. Pollock, as I inform you, that since the formation of this institute Mr. Elworthy has conducted himself in an honourable manner, and has never in any way whatever had any complaint brought against him by any of his clients, although it may not be what some of the first-rate firms in this country would do, yet it has been done by him, and he has conducted himself fairly and honourably, and no complaint whatever has been made against him:—My friend, Mr. Pollock, I believe, under those circumstances, would say that he has no desire for a moment to assert that any complaint has been made against Mr. Elworthy with reference to this institute, and under these circumstances, gentlemen, we have agreed to a course which I think is honourable to Mr. Elworthy and also to the defendant, that is to withdraw a juror and so settle the dispute between the parties.

Pollock, Q.C.—My Lord, my course, representing Mr. Milliken, who is the proprietor of the Solicitors' Journal and Reporter, upon the present occasion is a very simple one. I am not here, gentlemen, either to go into the character or previous history of the plaintiff in this action, Mr. Elworthy, nor am I here to in any way refer to any past conduct which may have been his. All I have to say is this—that what was done was done, as my friend has said, by the editor in the discharge of his duty as editor of this journal, in making comments upon what was supposed to be, and was certainly considered to be, as my friend says, a somewhat irregular course of proceeding for a solicitor. If my learned friend's client thinks the view correct which he has taken, on behalf of my client I am equally satisfied, it being admitted that the comment was that sort of comment which was fairly and honourably made, not with the intention of personally effecting anything like the ruin of an individual, or making anything like a personal attack, in the sense of a personal attack, upon the plaintiff. Mr. Elworthy was entirely unknown to my client, and the facts which came before him came before him in the ordinary course of public inquiry through the newspapers, and these comments were made in the usual manner in which such comments are written. Under these circumstances I consider that my client is acting quite correctly, and I entirely sanction the course he takes, in not opposing the course which my learned friend has adopted of withdrawing a juror.

A juror was accordingly withdrawn. Another action commenced by the same plaintiff, for the same alleged libels, against the printers of the Solicitors' Journal was at the same time abandoned.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

BASINGHALL-STREET.

(Before MR. REGISTRAR BROUGHAM, Sitting for the Chief Judge.)

April 5.—Re Taylor.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 7—Summons under—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, ss. 192 and 198—Deed of Assignment.

The debtor, J. T. Taylor, executed in August, 1869, a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, which was duly registered under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. In March of the present year a creditor whose debt had been incurred prior to the execution of the deed caused a summons to be issued under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 7, stating that in the event of the debtor failing to pay the amount specified in the summons or to compound for the same to the satisfaction of the creditor, a petition might be prescribed against him praying that he might be adjudged a bankrupt. It appeared that at the period of issuing the summons no mention was made by the creditor of the fact that the debtor had executed a deed of assignment under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

Mr. Lawrence, solicitor for the debtor, pointed out that after the execution of a deed under the 192nd section no process could be made available by a creditor without the leave of the Court under the 198th section, and in this case no such leave had been obtained. He characterised the proceedings as an attempt to extort a preference in favour of an individual creditor, to which he was not fully entitled.

Mr. Kisch, solicitor for the creditor, said that the summons was issued under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and could not be affected by any provision of the old law. He repudiated altogether the deed and the proceedings thereunder, and contended that he had a clear right to issue the summons.

Mr. Registrar BROUGHAM, advertent to the fact that at the time of the issuing of the summons no mention was made of the registration of the deed of assignment, was of opinion that the proceedings were altogether irregular, and dismissed the summons, with costs.

April 6.—Re Ellison—50th rule—Practice.

Reed applied under this petition for liquidation for an injunction to restrain proceedings in bankruptcy instituted against the debtor. It appeared that an interim injunction had already been granted, and notice of motion had been given to the petitioning creditor.

Mr. Munns, solicitor, for the petitioning creditor, took a preliminary objection to the hearing of the application. The notice of motion stated that in support of the application an affidavit of William Ditchman would be used, but no copy of any affidavit by Mr. Ditchman had been served, and it was not known whether such affidavit had been filed. The only affidavit served upon the petitioning creditor appeared to be made by the debtor himself, upon an application for the appointment of a receiver; and it was submitted that the proceedings were irregular.

Reed observed that the file of proceedings disclosed all the facts—the nomination of a receiver, and the interim injunction—the appointment of a first meeting, and the notice of the present application.

Mr. Registrar Brougham said that if the copy affidavit had not been served, there was end of the matter. He could only adjourn it on the consent of the petitioning creditor; otherwise the application must be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Munns said that in proceedings under the new law it was of importance that the greatest strictness should be observed. He could not consent to a postponement.

Mr. Registrar Brougham said that the present application would be dismissed, with costs. The interim injunction would be extended to a day sufficiently long to enable the debtor to give a fresh notice of motion.

COUNTY COURTS.

LOWESTOFT.

(Before JOHN WORLEDGE, Esq., Judge.)

Feb. 25, March 25.—Slater v. Porter and Linder.

Admiralty Jurisdiction—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 182.

A custom that in case of the loss of a fishing vessel the value shall be deducted from the wages of the crew.

Held, illegal when incorporated into agreement between owner and crew.

This was a suit for wages instituted by the plaintiff (a fisherman, of Blundeston, Suffolk), who was one of the crew, against the defendants (William Porter and Robert John Linder), who were the owners of the late fishing lugger Onwards, of Lowestoft; the plaintiff claimed £12.

The Onwards was engaged in the herring fishery last autumn, and she was sunk in a collision with the lugger Finish at the mouth of the Lowestoft Harbour on the 4th November last; the present defendants having instituted a suit in this court against the Finish and her owners, the case was heard on the 31st December last before the judge and nautical assessors; the assessors were of opinion that the Onwards was alone to blame for the collision and the suit was dismissed with costs. After the suit was decided the crew of the Onwards went to the defendant Porter for a settlement, and Porter ultimately claimed to deduct the value of the Onwards and the law costs from the gross earnings of the Onwards up to the 4th November, and as that with other deductions which could be legally made exhausted the whole gross earnings, he refused to pay the crew anything.

Mr. WORLEDGE, after stating the facts, delivered the following judgment:—The Onwards undoubtedly "sailed by the shore," and the only question in the cause is whether, in making up the "earnings of the boat," the defendants, were entitled to deduct the value of the Onwards and the costs of the suit against the Finish from the gross earnings of the Onwards up to the time she was lost.

It was contended, on the part of the defendants, that by custom they were so entitled, and evidence was given of five instances of the value of a lost boat being allowed the owners on the making up of the earnings of the boat, it could not be expected that many such instances should be proved, as the "sailing by the shore" had only been in vogue some twenty years. Under the old system the crews were paid so much a last for all the fish caught and the owners then bore all losses.

But in sailing by the shore the owners are entitled to deduct for lost and damaged nets, as was established in this court by the verdict of a jury in the year 1863 in a case of Norman v. Capps, and there was evidence in the present case that the owners are also entitled to deduct for lost or damaged sails and the like, and it appeared difficult to me where to draw the line so as not to deduct the value of the fishing lugger herself if lost.

Mr. Wiltshire (solicitor for plaintiff) on the other hand contended that five instances in twenty years were not sufficient to establish the custom set up for the defendants. And further, that even if the custom was established in point of fact, it was illegal and void as being in contravention of the policy of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 182, inasmuch as the custom tended to work a forfeiture of all the men's earnings. The section referred to is in these terms: "No seaman shall by any agreement forfeit his lien upon the ship, or be deprived of any remedy for the recovery of his wages, to which he would otherwise have been entitled; and every stipulation in any agreement inconsistent with any provision of this Act, and every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon his right to wages in the case of the loss of the ship, or to abandon any right which he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage, shall be wholly inoperative." By section 18 of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, the case of seamen belonging to any ship which, according to the terms of the agreement is to be employed on salvage services, is exempted from the operation of the 182nd section of the earlier Act, but in other respects that section is in full operation, and any agreement made in contravention of the terms of that section, absolutely void.

Now assuming any custom to be established in point of fact, the way in which it operates upon contracts is to suppose it incorporated in the contracts, and in the present case we must suppose that if there had been written articles entered into, that one stipulation would have been this, "that in the event of the lugger being lost, the value of the lugger shall be deducted from the gross earnings in the making up of the voyage." And from what was stated at the trial, I conclude that as a general rule the value of a fishing lugger would, if deducted from the gross earnings absorb the whole of them; in other words, would cause a forfeiture of the whole of the crew's earnings or wages. If so it is clear that the stipulations I have supposed inserted in the articles would be void, as being in contravention of the terms of the 182nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. And if so, a custom which it is contended governs all agreements between the owners and crews of fishing luggers, and has the same effect as the stipulation I have supposed to be inserted in written articles between an owner and crew, is equally opposed to the terms and spirit of the above section of the Merchant Shipping Act, and must be held to be equally void and inoperative, and I therefore am of opinion that the custom set up in the present case is void in law, and the judgment of the Court must be for the plaintiff.

Judgment for plaintiff, with costs.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. WILLIAM HENRY COOKE, Q.C., Judge of the Norfolk County Courts, has been appointed a Magistrate for the county, and took the oaths and his seat, at Norwich, on the 22nd of March. Mr. Cooke was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in June, 1837, and formerly went the Oxford Circuit. On the death of Mr. Serjeant Manning, in 1867, Mr. Cooke was appointed Recorder of Oxford, and Judge of the Norfolk County Courts (Circuit No. 32).

Mr. EDWARD WILLIAM COX, serjeant-at-law, has been appointed Deputy-Assistant Judge at the Middlesex Sessions, in succession to the late Mr. Joseph Payne. Mr. Serjeant Cox was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in May, 1843, and became a serjeant-at-law in May, 1868. He belonged to the Western Circuit. He was recorder of Helston and Falmouth from 1857, till June, 1868, when he was appointed Recorder of Portsmouth.

Mr. JOHN JAMES HEATH SAINT, barrister-at-law, of the Middle Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Newark-on-Trent, in succession to Mr. S. B. Bristowe, who has resigned on being elected M.P. for that borough. Mr. Saint was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in May, 1854, and practises on the Midland Circuit, and at the Warwick, Coventry, and Birmingham Sessions.

Mr. PAUL OCTAVIUS HAYTHORNE REED, solicitor, of Bridgwater, Somersetshire, has been appointed coroner for that borough, in the room of Mr. J. Poole, deceased. Mr. Reed, who was certificated as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1849, has for some years been deputy-coroner of Bridgwater.

Mr. THOMAS HENRY ALDERTON, solicitor, of 97, Edgware-road, has been appointed a London Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

Mr. JAMES WALKINS, solicitor, of Bolton, Lancashire, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds to be executed by married women.

Mr. HENRY STANLEY WHALLEY, solicitor, of Blackburn, Lancashire, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking affidavits in the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer.

Mr. HENRY DENT HINRICH, of Bedford, has been appointed by the Lord Chancellor a Commissioner to Administer Oaths in Chancery in England.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

AMALGAMATIONS OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Sir,—I have just seen a pamphlet entitled "Life Assurance Companies and their Amalgamations" by a Solicitor, in which the author does me the honour to reply to the remarks contained in my letter published in your number of the 5th of February last. He states in a note at foot of the first page, that the principal part of the substance of his observations are contained in a letter written by him in answer to my said letter, and published in your Journal on the 5th of March. That letter unfortunately escaped my notice; otherwise I should have adverted to it in the letter of mine which last week you kindly inserted, with reference to the same subject. The writer of the pamphlet has, from a policyholder's point of view, offered some very pertinent observations. After stating the decision in favour of the annuitant in the Family Endowment case, he asks (p. 1):—Is there any difference in the case of a policyholder who has not entered into any new contract, and has paid his premiums to another company by direction of the company with which he contracted without any intimation from either company that it was intended that such payment should release the company contracting with him from their engagement? This question, assuming, as it does, that the policyholder has not entered into any fresh contract, almost invites an answer in the affirmative; but even conceding the absence of any novation in the case to which he refers, I still maintain that, owing to the peculiar nature of the contract of insurance, which requires the performance of a periodical act on the part of the assured, in order to keep the policy alive, a direction by the insurers to pay the annual premium to another company, unless within the powers conferred by the deed, will not, as against the former company, prevent a lapse. The decision in the Family Endowment case applies solely to the case of the transfer of an existing liability, where no further act remained to be done on the part of the creditor in order to complete his demand. The Lord Chancellor observes in his judgment on the fact that the annuitant had made no payment to the new company. Much difficulty, in point of classification, will arise in these cases, owing to the great diversity of the clauses of the deeds of settlement of each company, more especially those, if any exist, which recognise or regulate the power of dissolution, transfer, or amalgamation.

In regard to these powers, insurance companies may be divided into two classes, namely, those which have power to amalgamate with or to transfer their capital and liabilities to other companies; and those which have no such powers. With regard to the former class, I submit that, as regards all policies current at the date of the amalgamation, provided the powers conferred upon the company have been strictly pursued, the policyholder will be, by virtue of the original contract, transferred to the new body, whether he likes it or not. For this proposition I cite Re Waterloo Assurance Company, Ex parte Carr (33 Beav. 542). In fact, the trite, but often forgotten, advice to those about to insure, to read over their policies, seems peculiarly appropriate when we consider that one of the contracting parties is a quasi-corporate body, which is entirely governed by its articles of association, which are expressly or impliedly incorporated by reference into every policy which it issues. My former letter, which the "Solicitor" has noticed, chiefly refers to the better class of companies, which have no amalgamative powers, and which class, for the purpose of my argument include, of course, those which, in amalgamating, do not pursue such powers as they may possess. With reference to such I again respectfully reiterate the proposition I have already asserted, namely, that such amalgamations being ultra vires, and therefore void, all arrangements founded thereon, including the appointment of the transferees, as their agents, receivers and paymasters, are equally void; and the recent decision of Vice-Chancellor Stuart in Re Empire Assurance Company, Ex parte Challis and Others, answers the difficulty suggested by the "Solicitor," showing, as it does, that want of power to sell will invalidate a transfer, notwithstanding that the purchasing company had authority to buy. This "new point," for which the "Solicitor" gives me the credit of starting, he encounters, on the ground, as I understand him, of the company being as it were estopped from disputing the validity of the payment, in consequence of their obligation, upon their dissolution, to make a proper provision for meeting their engagements. But I need hardly say that a dissolution and an amalgamation with another company are very different things. The judgment of Cockburn, C.J., in King v. The Accumulative Life Fund and General Assurance Company (3 C. B. N. S. 151, 6 W. R. 12), clearly points out the distinction, and shows that an amalgamation is ultra vires and void when effected under colour of a power to wind up the company.

The obvious remedy of the policy-holder in such a case, if he declines to be transferred, is to claim the full value of his policy. The other objection taken by the "Solicitor" to my "new point" is that the assenting shareholders at least, if not the company, would be bound. I do not at present stop to consider if such would be the case. It is enough for my argument that the company, as such, would not be concluded by such payments. Many of the members of the company are probably under legal disability, and the estates of deceased members, if any such there be, are also contributories. It would be most unjust that these should be made liable in the events above alluded to. The "Solicitor" cites the case of King v. The Accumulative, &c., as conclusive against me on the question of the right of action of the dissenting policy-holder against the company which transfers its business. I think that all it actually decides is that there is no express or implied contract by the company with the policyholder that they will retain in their own hands their capital, and not part therewith; and that an action on a quasi timet principle was not maintainable against the company; but it does not determine that the policyholder might not treat the act of the company in refusing to accept the annual premium as such a deliberate abandonment of the contract as to entitle him forthwith to sue for damages. (See Coot v. Ambergate Railway Company, 17 Q. B. Rep. 127.) As to the option I have given him of restraining the company by injunction, or at least of putting them under terms, he objects on the grounds of the probability that the arrangement will have been completed and the assets handed over before the matter reaches the ears of the creditor. But this does not apply to transactions of this sort, more or indeed nearly so much, as to many other grievances where an injunction is the appropriate remedy. Amalgamations are always heard of on 'Change, and even if one should have been so skillfully arranged as to have been concealed at the time from the policyholder, he will hear of it quite early enough to have the assets, if any, impounded for his claim. In thus offering my reasons, from the shareholder's point of view, as against that of the policyholder, I do not seek to discuss the important question as to what may be the liability of directors promoting or concurring in these said amalgamations. I would only remark that many of the concluding observations of the "Solicitor" would be more appropriate if confined to the acts of the governing bodies of the companies instead of being levelled against the shareholders at large.

A BARRISTER.

THE LEISURE HOUR.

The editor of the Leisure Hour sends to the editor of the Solicitors' Journal the part for April; at page 257 is a note on lawyers' charges. The criticisms on the article in the February Leisure Hour were in some points quite just, and the editor has expressed his regret that the article was admitted in the form in which it appeared.

The contributor to the Solicitors' Journal is mistaken in supposing the Leisure Hour to be a magazine for "Sunday reading in the nursery"—at least his ideas of such reading must differ from the general opinion of the press, as shown in the enclosed extracts. The editor of the Leisure Hour will take every opportunity of making reparation for the wrong caused by the too indiscriminating tone of the first article. He is obliged to the editor of the Solicitors' Journal and to private correspondents for bringing the point before him.

COUNTY VOTING.

Sir,—A lady who is the owner of a house held for a long term and worth upwards of £80 per annum wishes to be rated for the relief of the poor in respect of it, but would like so to deal with the property as to give two of her sons a vote for the county. Can any of your readers suggest a method of effecting the desired object? The clause as to the lodger franchise is inapplicable.

IGNORAMUS.

Sir,—The Attorneys' and Solicitors' Remuneration Bill is now in committee, and I think it high time that attorneys and solicitors should be protected as well as clients. It often costs £1,000, and seldom less than £500 before an attorney is fit to practice, and then he has to wait for business. The examination also is one which requires the education of a gentleman, and yet the profitable part of the profession is intruded upon by persons who have been clerks in attorneys' offices, then start as law agents, accountants, auctioneers, and now liquidators. In cities as well as every country town in England are to be found as many as one to four who ply like a cabby for hire, in case of illness to make a will, or death to assist in proving, passing the residuary and succession duty accounts, holding auctions, and in case they are referred to a solicitor, then these parasitical lawyers employ the same attorney. There is no responsibility against the use of forged stamps, although I never knew any; wills are made, often no executor named, and which is difficult to comprehend, yet they pass, and there are those who pride themselves, and persons of property and position too, that their law business is done without an attorney. If it was made penal to charge directly or indirectly for preparing these documents, or the party could at any time after recover back any fees paid, this would be a great check. The auctioneer is protected by the Excise for his £10 certificate or license, but we have no protection whatever for our £6. All probates ought to pass through the hands of an attorney, and it is to be feared that parties prove at the court for less and avoid the stamp as well as the attorney. Residuary accounts ought to be attested by an attorney and declared, as well as succession.

Sir,—Will you, or one of your readers, inform me what are the necessary subjects to take up in an examination for a B.A. degree at London University; or, if this information is contained in the London University Calendar, where and at what price that publication may be obtained?

AN ARTICLED CLERK.

J. J. Wright, a coloured man, who sits in the General Assembly as senator from Beaufort county, was elected yesterday Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of this State. Wright was born in Pennsylvania, graduated at the Lancasterian University in New York, studied law for two years at Montrose, Pa., and was admitted to the bar in Susquehanna county, being the first coloured man admitted to practice in Pennsylvania. In 1865 he came South, and was made legal adviser of the South Carolina freedmen. He was a delegate to the reconstruction convention, and was afterward elected to the State senate. Wright is quiet, well-behaved and decidedly intelligent, but neither his decency nor his little knowledge of the law caused his election to the highest judicial position in the State. He was elected solely and simply because he is a coloured man.—Charleston (U.S.) News.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

April 1.—Bankruptcy Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill.—The Marquis of Clanricarde laid on the table a bill, the object of which was to place non-traders in the same category as traders. The bill was read a first time, and its second reading was fixed for the 2nd of May.

Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill.—On the motion of Earl Granville, their Lordships agreed not to insist upon their amendment to which the Commons had refused to assent.

Their Lordships rose at twenty-five minutes past five.

April 4.—The following bills received the Royal assent:—The Peace Preservation (Ireland), Mutiny, Marine Mutiny, and Coinage Bills.

The Owen's College Extension Bill was read a third time and passed.

Revision and Uniformity of Sentences.—Lord Penzance moved for a return of the criminal sentences remitted, reduced, or varied by the Crown under the advice of the Home Secretary during the last three years, distinguishing the cases in which the ground of interference was the supposed innocence of the parties, the severity of the sentence, or other causes. In doing so, he dwelt at length upon the defects of the existing system, particularly the uncertainty and the absence of publicity of the action of the Home Secretary. He recommended the constitution of a Court of Appeal, consisting of common law judges or ex-judges, or members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, as well as the Home Secretary, who should revise sentences. After some remarks from Lord Morley, the Duke of Richmond, Lord Lyveden, and the Lord Chancellor, the motion was withdrawn.

April 5.—The Ecclesiastical Patronage Transfer Bill was read a second time on the motion of Lord Lyttelton.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

April 1.—Mr. Charley gave notice that on the 29th instant he would call attention to the recent appointment of Mr. Lowry, Q.C., to a court at Manchester, and put a question to the Government on the subject.

Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill.—On the motion of Mr. Gladstone, the Lords' amendments were agreed to with one exception, which, as affecting a matter of taxation and therefore the privileges of the Commons, was rejected.

The Irish Land Bill was then resumed in committee and the following amendment, to be inserted at the commencement of clause 2, in accordance with Mr. Gladstone's proposal on the previous evening, was adopted:—"If, in the case of any holding not situate within the province of Ulster, it shall appear that a usage prevails which in all essential particulars corresponds with the Ulster tenant right custom, it shall, in like manner, and subject to the like conditions, be deemed legal, and shall be enforced in manner provided by this Act."

—Sir J. Gray then proposed to insert all the remainder of the clause. Upon this much discussion took place.—Mr. Gladstone said the intention of the words which had been adopted was to apply the whole body of clause 1 to the case of the Ulster tenant right custom if found to exist in its essential particulars out of Ulster. They proposed to find a much simpler substitute for clause 2, by two alterations in clause 6, which he would state to the committee when they arrived at the clause. The amendment was agreed to. It was then put that the clause as amended should stand part of the bill, and the clause as amended was negative.—Upon clause 3, providing for compensation in the absence of custom, Mr. Downing proposed an amendment defining a minimum of compensation.—Mr. C. Fortescue opposed the amendment, which was withdrawn.—Mr. Walpole objected to the clause.—The Solicitor-General for Ireland proposed the addition of words, made necessary by the option given under the first clause to a tenant to give up his right under the Ulster custom, for the purpose of claiming under the subsequent sections. If clause 3 remained as it was it might be held to bar the power given to the Ulster tenant to come in under the subsequent compensation clauses. The amendment was agreed to.—Mr. Corrance said this clause, providing as it did for compensation in the absence of custom, contained what he might call the major proposition of the bill. What was the reason for it? It was not Fenianism, for the landlords were not implicated in that; nor was it the number of evictions, for nine-tenths of them took place in consequence of the non-payment of rent. What had the landlords done to be subjected to this clause? They would be told that they had not improved as they ought. But look at the difficulties they had been under. By this clause they were creating a new tenant right, while by other clauses they had provided for the gradual extinction of the Ulster tenant right custom. The clause assumed a right of occupation, but he denied that there was any such right. They ought to define what was disturbance. He moved to leave out the words, "disturbed in his holding by act of the," in order to insert the words, "evicted by, or consequent upon notice to quit from landlord."—Colonel Barttelot thought they ought to have some clearer definition of what disturbance by the landlord was.—Mr. Synan said the effect of this amendment would be to deprive nine-tenths of the tenants of compensation.—Mr. Bruen said some sort of definition should be given of "disturbance" by the landlord.—Mr. Gladstone said that his objection to the amendment was that it did not define the word disturbance at all, though it professed to do so. So far from being a word unknown to the law, it was perfectly known, and had been referred to in former Acts. He also objected to the amendment on account of its vagueness. The purport of the motion was to lay down the principle that on the termination of a lease there would be no notice to quit, so that a lease for a year and a day would bar eviction. It was simply the destruction of the bill. The House never would consent that when a tenancy from year to year would give the tenant a claim for compensation under eviction a lease for a year and a day would not.—Mr. Hunt thought that there ought to be a definition of the word disturbance.—Mr. Gladstone said that the Solicitor-General thought it better to give an interpretation to the word tenant rather than to define the word disturbance.—Mr. Headlam was of opinion that a tenant was bound to give up peaceable possession of premises held under lease at its expiration.—Lord J. Manners said that they were legislating for Ireland on the assumption that the tenants were the most ignorant as well as helpless of people. In point of fact if they were offered leases of a year and a day they would not accept them.—The Solicitor-General for Ireland said that the scope and object of the bill was to give compensation at the expiration of the lease. If the amendment was accepted it would deal a death-blow to the bill. It was necessary to legislate for Irish tenantry in a different manner to that in which they did for English tenants; and he mentioned a case in which a large estate in the west of Ireland was held by the tenants for a year certain, and on its being disputed a stamped agreement with every tenant was produced.—Dr. Ball said that it was absolutely necessary to define the word disturbance. He asked whether an assignment was a disturbance or not. There should be a definition of disturbance declaring that neither assignment without leave nor eviction on the expiry of a lease was such disturbance.—Colonel W. Patten also thought a definition of the word desirable.—Mr. Herbert asked who was to have the compensation when the tenants were put on the land by a middleman.—Mr. Jessel considered that the amendment was wholly inconsistent with the general principle of the bill.—Mr. Gladstone reminded the committee that the two questions of definition of the word disturbance, and compensation to the tenant disturbed, were wholly distinct. The first was a proper subject of consideration, but what the hon. gentleman opposite wanted was that compensation should only be given in cases where a tenant had received notice to quit, to which the Government could not consent.—Mr. Corrance then withdrew the amendment on the understanding that Mr. Headlam's would be persevered in.—Mr. W. Shaw then moved an amendment providing that the notice of disturbance signed by the landlord should contain full reasons for it, and that the compensation should include the value of the reclamation of land and the buildings and improvements as well as inexhausted manure and tillage, the amount to be in the discretion of the judge. He contended that great care should be taken in the selection of the judges of the new land courts.—Mr. C. Fortescue opposed the amendment on the ground that any directions to the judge in respect to the assessment of damages were unnecessary, and that the reasons of the landlord for disturbing the tenant must be given to the court, so that it was unnecessary to give them in the notice. The clause constituting the court gave the fullest powers to deal with the whole question.—Sir P. O'Brien urged on the government the propriety of constituting the new courts in such a manner that they should be presided over by accomplished judges at adequate salaries, so that they might obtain the confidence of the people.—Mr. Bruen concurred.—Mr. Brewer said that the subject of the constitution of the courts would be discussed in another clause.—Mr. M'C. Downing said that the persons who were to be selected under the bill to fill the office of judges would be fully competent to the performance of the duties.—The amendment was withdrawn.—Mr. C. Fortescue then moved an amendment in line one of the clause, the object of which was to effect entirely that which had only been partially effected by the bill as originally framed, namely, the separation of the question of compensation for improvements other than permanent improvements from that of damages for eviction or loss sustained on quitting the holding.—Dr. Ball said that the proposal of the Chief Secretary was one to alter the original plan of the bill as regarded compensation. The effect of the amendment would be to give the tenant a right to damages for the simple act of eviction, however legal or just it might be; and he considered that the committee had a right to complain of a new principle of this important character being introduced into the bill in the shape of an amendment. If they once admitted this principle they could not suppose that it would be confined to Ireland. If it be contended that the principle is abstractedly a right one, why should not the tenants of England and Scotland have the benefit of it? The bill had been very elaborately framed, and every point well weighed, and yet the principle now embodied in the amendment was not contemplated at the time when the measure was prepared. He trusted that the amendment, which was pregnant with very serious consequences, would be rejected by the committee.—Mr. Gladstone denied that there was the smallest reason to complain of the conduct of the Government in proposing this amendment. It was not a new principle. The Government had never admitted the construction put upon the bill by the right honourable gentleman, but they had, as they were entitled to do, put their own meaning on their own bill, and it was rather hard upon the Government that the right hon. gentleman should complain that they had been guilty of some breach of faith. He (Mr. Gladstone) must entirely disclaim the notion that the Government had introduced a new principle into the bill. He had stated on the second reading that he thought sufficient ground had been shown for effecting a more complete separation between compensation for improvements and damages for simple eviction. With regard to the effect that this enactment was to have upon the rights of property and upon the relative rights of rich and poor, that was a matter which, he dared say, the committee would have to consider when they got a little further into the discussion; but one thing he would say, and it was this, that when they talked in that House of the rights of rich and poor, let them remember that they were in an assembly in which the poor were not represented. It was an assembly in which poor men were not contained, and which, having for 600 years had under its charge legislation for Ireland, had, by the manner in which that legislation had been conducted, presented to them the state of things which they now found in Ireland. It would be to the convenience of the committee if the amendment were accepted as a verbal amendment, as it had no connection with the substantial changes in the bill. The right hon. member for Bucks had an amendment proposing compensation in certain cases; the Secretary for Ireland proposed compensation in certain other cases; and on these two amendments the question of principle could be decided.—Mr. Disraeli said that if the amendment was to be taken as merely technical, the Secretary for Ireland had misled them by stating that it was to be the preliminary to important changes. The clause originally proposed a sliding scale of compensation, and the most important point in it was that there was to be no compensation for eviction on termination of lease. Now the right hon. gentleman introduced an entirely new scale, and thus justified the observations of his right hon. friend the member for Dublin University.—Sir R. Palmer accepted the amendment as merely verbal, and not affecting the principle. He therefore deprecated taking any division on the amendment.—Mr. Hardy understood that if the amendment was now taken as verbal, the amendment of the member for Bucks should have precedence on Monday evening. The amendment was agreed to.

April 4.—The Irish Land Bill was resumed in committee at clause 3, and Mr. Disraeli moved an amendment, limiting compensation to unexhausted improvements and interruption in any course of husbandry suited to the holding, excluding altogether damages for simple determination of tenancy. He said he was compelled to lead the opposition to this part of the clause by the changes made in the bill since it got into committee—the extension of the Ulster tenant-right all over Ireland, the dropping of clause 16, which would have given the landlords power to bargain themselves out of the bill by a thirty-one years' lease, and the proposed declaration that the simple termination of a tenancy demands compensation. He was ready to give all that justice required—viz., compensation for improvements; and he would extend it to interruption of a course of agriculture. But the idea of the Government to compensate for disturbance without reference to these points would give every tenant a contingent remainder to one-third of the freehold. It was opposed to the essential principles of our legislation, it was unjustified by the necessities of Ireland, and would not satisfy the tenant farmers.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer denied that there had been any change in the principle of the clause. It had always recognised compensation for disturbance, though originally it was mixed up with improvements, which had been found inconvenient. The legal right of the landlord to disturb was not ignored, but it was treated as a right liable to abuse, the unchecked exercise of which was a standing danger to Ireland, and raised the bitterest feelings between landlords and tenants. So far from being an invasion of the rights of property the clause would render property more secure and valuable.—Mr. Hardy enforced Mr. Disraeli's charge that the clause had been essentially changed by making the termination of tenancy alone a subject for damages.—Sir Roundell Palmer said he could not vote for Mr. Disraeli's amendment. He agreed with Mr. Disraeli that the bill had been considerably altered in committee, and he acknowledged that he had not originally understood that a tenant on giving up his land at the end of his lease was to be compensated for the surrender. As to the prospective effects of the clause, and, with regard to the last, he maintained that it involved an interference with the freedom of contract which could only be justified by extreme necessity. But no necessity had been shown which could apply to holdings above a certain value or to bond fide leases for a definite duration—say, for seven years. If the consideration of improvements was to be eliminated, he held that the scale of damages was enormous, and he showed how it would complicate the working of the equities clause. The proposed removal of clause 16, enabling the landlord to cover himself by a thirty-one years' lease, he censured.—Mr. Chichester Fortescue vindicated the Government from the charge of having suddenly changed the principle of the clause, though he admitted that it had been liberalised, and a larger discretion had been given to the court.—Mr. C. S. Read argued that the principle once established must be extended.—Mr. C. Buxton discussed the principle of the bill, which he described rather as a vindication than a violation of the rights of property.—Mr. Brodrick, Sir P. O'Brien, Mr. Kavanagh, Mr. H. Matthews, Mr. Wm. Fowler, Mr. Bruen, Mr. Maguire, and Mr. Goldney, also spoke.—Mr. Gladstone, stated that in place of clause 16 (the thirty-one years' clause) he would propose to permit the landlord to give the tenant the right of disposing of his interest; and also that, in order to mark the exceptional character of the suspension of free contracts, that particular clause would be limited to twenty years, and thereafter until Parliament should otherwise determine. The amendment was directed against the bill as it originally stood. It sought to break down one of the three great pillars of the bill, without which it would be a miserable ruin, viz., the principle that causeless eviction was a loss to the tenant, and ought to be laden with a charge so as to prevent the landlord from resorting to it. The loss to the tenant was the loss of his livelihood—the choice offered him “between America and the workhouse”—for which the clause laid down that he ought to be compensated.—Mr. Disraeli having replied, the amendment was negatived by a majority of 76, the numbers being 296 to 220.

April 5.—Bridgwater and Beverley.—The Attorney-General gave notice that on Friday next he would move for leave to introduce a bill to disfranchise the boroughs of Bridgwater and Beverley.

The Irish Land Bill was resumed in Committee at clause 3.—Mr. Gladstone moved an amendment which he said would have no effect whatever in altering the intention of the framers of the bill, but would serve to clear up certain doubts which had been raised by the member for Richmond. The amendment, as it stood on the notice paper, was after “compensation” to insert “for the loss sustained by him in quitting his holding.” He proposed to amend those words as follows:—“For the loss which the Court shall find to have been sustained by him in quitting his holding.” These words would, he thought, show that it was to be a matter of judicial cognisance.—Mr. Chaplin said that an impression seemed to have sprung up in favour of putting aside all English expression of opinion on this question. He protested altogether against a dictum of that sort; and he must say that, having regard to the application of Irish views and customs in Ireland, the conclusion was irresistibly forced upon him that if English views and customs had been adopted a little more in Ireland, that country would have been in a more fortunate condition. With regard to the question before the Committee, they were entitled to a much more explicit explanation than had been yet given of the nature of the loss to be compensated. For improvements, for interruption in a course of husbandry, for loss and inconvenience in changing from a farm, he would compensate liberally; but he could not conceive a more monstrous proposition than to compel a man to pay for the non-continuance of that privilege which had in the first instance emanated from himself.—Mr. Walter said that although the words now proposed improved the amendment, they did not obviate the objection which he entertained to it. He objected to the amendment because the Government proposed to make an advance upon the scale of damages as it originally stood in the bill.—Lord J. Manners contended that the amendments which had been introduced were hostile to English and Scotch notions of common sense.—Mr. Osborne said that the principle of the clause was, that the tenant should have compensation for disturbance in his holding; and a most important principle it was. He contended that the bill was not only necessary but inevitable, and that it would not be of the slightest use to Ireland without the disturbance clause. They talked of introducing English systems and English customs into Ireland, but he believed that the Irish customs were much better suited, and that all that was necessary to introduce from England was a little more English money. They wanted protection for the small landholder, and in that belief he supported the bill, and especially the clause then before the Committee.—Dr. Ball said that, although the bill originally spoke of damages for evictions, alterations of principles had been made by the recent Government amendments. When they proposed compensation to the tenant for loss on quitting a holding, and appended to the proposition a sliding scale of compensation, it might be understood as an intimation to the judge to take that scale as the standard of damages for eviction, but the intention was now made clear by the words “which shall be determined by the court to have been sustained by the tenant on quitting his holding.” The objection of principle, however, remained, and he could not consent to any proposal which would give damages for eviction.—Mr. W. H. Gregory supported the clause because it contained the principle of compensation for arbitrary eviction, and if that were omitted they might as well throw the bill into the fire.—Mr. Delahunty looked upon the principle of compensation for disturbance of tenants as will as the vital part of the measure.—Mr. C. Fortescue said the member for Dublin University admitted that the Government had from the first intended to provide compensation for loss of occupation to the Irish tenant, independent of the question of improvement. The Government were of opinion that in the present exceptional and dangerous condition of Ireland, a mere system of compensation for improvements could not meet the necessities of the case.—Mr. Henley thought they had reason to complain of the difficulty the Government had placed them in.—Sir G. Colthurst considered that the amendments introduced by the Government into the bill had completely changed its character, by giving compensation for occupancy apart from compensation for improvements, and by the omission of the 16th clause.—Colonel Barttelot asked for a specific declaration on the part of the Government why they had put this provision on the paper. He looked upon the clause as a direct interference with property.—Mr. Sanderson said the plan of the Government, which was called a novel one, was old enough in Ulster. If they took out the principle of compensation for loss of occupancy, the bill would have no value for the majority of the Irish people.—Mr. Gladstone defended the clause as amended, which was opposed by Mr. Hardy.—

Mr. Moore, Sir G. Jenkinson and Colonel S. Kent having spoken, the amendment was carried by a majority of 111, the numbers being 293 to 182.—Mr. Corrance moved an amendment, limiting the compensation for disturbance to five years' rent, and making it apply only to tenements rateable at not exceeding £15.—Mr. C. Fortescue objected that the amendment was premature, and should be discussed when the scale came under consideration. On the merits he thought that the amendment too much restricted the compensation. The amendment was withdrawn.

The Survey of Great Britain, &c., Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Payment of Members.—Mr. P. A. Taylor moved for leave to bring in a bill to restore the ancient constitutional custom of the payment of members of Parliament. The motion was opposed by Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Cross, and Lord Bury, and on a division was lost by a majority of 187, the numbers being 211 to 24.

April 6.—The second reading of the Site for Places of Worship Bill was moved by Mr. O. Morgan. After a debate, in which Mr. Richards, Mr. G. Gregory, Mr. Hardy, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Hinde Palmer, Mr. Horsman, Mr. Candlish, Mr. Henley, Mr. B. Hope, Mr. Mowbray, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. S. Hill, Mr. Liddell, Sir J. Hanmer, and Mr. Pease took part, the bill was read a second time.

The Jurors' Bill was read a second time.

The second reading of the Summary Conviction Bill was moved by Mr. Denman. But being opposed, the bill was withdrawn.

The Attorneys' and Solicitors' Remuneration Bill was resumed in committee at clause 7, relating to a solicitor's lien on his client's deed.—Sir J. Trelawny strongly opposed the clause.—Mr. G. Gregory pointed out that the client had a very easy method of displacing his solicitor's lien.—After a few words from Mr. Dickinson and Mr. M. Chambers, the Solicitor-General suggested that as the clause in its present shape was not one that ought to pass, it should now be negatived in order that another clause, which would require very careful wording, might be brought up at a later stage. The clause was negatived accordingly. Clause 9 was agreed to, with several verbal amendments.

OBITUARY.

MR. J. G. N. DARBY.

The death of Jonathan George Norton Darby, Esq., barrister-at-law, of the Home Circuit, took place at his London residence, Westbourne-park-road, on the 17th March. He was born in 1829, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in June, 1854, and practised as an equity draftsman and conveyancer, on the Home Circuit, and also at the various sessions held in the county of Sussex.

MR. J. T. GRAVES.

We have to record the death of John Thomas Graves, Esq., barrister-at-law, who had recently resigned the office of Poor Law Inspector, which took place on the 29th March, at his residence, Thirlestane Lodge, Cheltenham. He was born in 1806, and was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in June, 1831, and in 1846 was appointed a Poor Law Inspector.

MAJOR HENRY COPPOCK.

The death of Major Henry Coppock, solicitor, town clerk of Stockport, and clerk to the magistrates of that borough, took place suddenly on the 26th March, at his residence, Dar Bank House. He was born on the 31st March, 1806, and had therefore nearly completed his sixty-fourth year. Mr. Coppock was appointed clerk to the Stockport Board of Guardians in 1827, soon after obtaining his attorney's certificate. In 1835, on the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act, he was selected to be the first town clerk of Stockport, and continued in that office till November, 1848, when he was ejected by a small majority. In 1841 he was nominated clerk to the old Court of Requests, and in 1847 received the appointment of Registrar to the Stockport County Court. In 1864 Mr. Coppock was re-elected town clerk, which office has become vacant by his death.

Three women have lately been appointed justices of the peace in Wyoming Territory.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS

THE JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

The anniversary meeting of this society was held on the 30th ult., at its rooms, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square; Lord Westbury in the chair.

The Chairman expressed his regret that the society was about to lose the services of its hon. secretaries, Mr. C. H. Hopwood and Mr. W. Stebbing, and announced that their places would be supplied by Mr. H. R. Droop and Mr. A. C. Humphreys. He also proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. C. Clark, treasurer, and the retiring secretaries, which was unanimously carried. The names of Mr. Hopwood and Mr. Stebbing were added, among others, to the list of the council of the society.

The CHAIRMAN then rose, amid cheers, to deliver the annual address. He said that it was not without a remonstrance he had consented to preside on the present occasion, inasmuch as he desired the duty should devolve upon his noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, who was, however, prevented from undertaking it by his multifarious avocations. He must congratulate the society on the fact that its last year had been a year of progress, but he must suggest to the council the expediency of publishing an annual volume, containing not only what he might call its transactions, but some account of the discussions which followed the reading of the various papers at its meetings. Those papers, he might add, exhibited great ability, and he regretted that they were not so generally known as they deserved to be. He found on referring to the observations which he had made when he inaugurated the society in 1855, that several great and important subjects of legal amendment and of the advance of legal science had been submitted by him for the consideration of the society; but he was sorry to have to say that, with very few exceptions, all those subjects remained precisely in the same position in which they then stood. It was indeed extraordinary that with all the virtues of our national character there should be found mixed up so much of inertia, so much unwillingness to admit the imperfections of some of our institutions, and so much of timidity with regard to change or improvement. It was undoubtedly true that things in this country seldom underwent alteration until, after the lapse of many years, some overwhelming occurrence arose; and we then legislated very often in a hurry, and in the confusion of the moment, instead of making our amendments the result of deliberate judgment.

Having given expression to those preliminary remarks, he would advert to the subjects which the Government now proposed to lay before the people of England, and on which a learned body like that which he had the honour of addressing ought to be the guides of the public at large. One of the chief topics which he had submitted to the consideration of the society in 1855 was the paramount necessity of an alteration in our judicial institutions. He had pointed out how the province of justice, which ought to be one and entire, had been divided in England into two separate districts, unconnected with one another, and how necessary it was that they should be united together so that justice might be administered from a single source and not from opposite and conflicting sources. He recollected very well having made a similar statement some thirty years ago, and his suggestion was then looked upon as a mere dream that ought not to be seriously attended to. It had, however, won its way at last, and was recognised in the report of the Judicature Commission—a report emanating from persons of the highest possible authority in respect of station, intellect, and judgment—as indicating an improvement which was greatly demanded in our judicial institutions. The bill introduced by the Government, feeble and imperfect though it was, also recognised the principle for which he had long contended, and he should be exceedingly glad if the members of the Juridical Society would direct their attention to the subject. The Government proposed to form the existing courts of justice into one great corporate body, all the courts to be integral members of that body, and each court to be in itself self-sufficient, and armed with powers to administer every description of jurisdiction. But although that was the principle of the bill, the courts were to remain the same in name as now, and it was evident therefore, that the same courts which now administered law would have the inclination to delegate to those courts which at present administered equity any case arising before them which happened to be governed more particularly by the principles of equitable jurisdiction, so that we should not in reality attain after all anything like a perfect blending of the administration of law and equity. Now, he wished the society thoroughly to understand the consequences of the present separation of the two systems.

It was impossible that the mind of the judge, which was confined to one department, should be so much enlarged and instructed in the principles of the administration of justice as the mind of a judge who was trained to administer the duties which belonged to the whole province of jurisprudence. Was it not absurd, too, that the highest obligations of justice, as in the familiar cases of guardians and trustees, should be ignored by one set of courts, and that we should be compelled to resort to another set of courts to enforce the performance of the most plain and simple moral obligations? Yet such were our institutions that the most flagrant description of injustice—such as the corrupt exercise of power over the mind of another in the case of persons occupying positions of confidence and trust—was something unknown to our ordinary legal tribunals, and which they possessed no authority to punish or redress. Surely it was ridiculous to have such a division in the administration of justice; and although the Government now proposed to give that jurisdiction to which he referred, yet he was afraid the change would be of little use until we had men who were fitted by education to administer it; for it was, he was afraid, but too true—and true without reproach to any individual—that our courts had been so separated from one another that the practitioners and judges administering one form of justice knew but little of the principles or mode of procedure by which those were guided who administered justice under a different system. The remedy for the difficulty which he had just pointed out lay, as he had stated fifteen years ago, in a more enlarged system of legal education. The system of education for the law had, he was sorry to say, for a long time languished, and was even now far from being in a flourishing state; but until there was a system of education comprehending the whole province of justice, it would be idle to expect that we should have men who would be perfectly familiar with the universal principle of its administration, and capable of presiding over courts which were to be at once courts of law and courts of equity. Lord Mansfield, for instance, had left his mark on English law; but whence did he derive that enlarged comprehension of justice and that extensive power of applying its principles by which he was distinguished? He had in early youth received the chief part of his education in Scotland, and had become familiar with the civil law, drawing from that source the principles which he afterwards applied with so much credit and utility to the improvement of our jurisprudence. He trusted, therefore, that the society would agree with him as to the necessity of impressing on young men who were being brought up to the profession of the law how desirable it was that they should study the law in a different mode from that of mere memoriter application, and with other views than those of obtaining a proficiency in the ready citation of decided cases. It was useless to shut our eyes to the evils which existed, and if we wished to take that place in the jurisprudence of the world which this noble country was entitled to occupy, we must elevate our knowledge of jurisprudence as a science. Passing from that subject to the state of our law, he regretted to have to say that but little in the way of improvement had been effected in that respect during the last fifteen years. That little consisted in some expurgation of the statute-book and in some acknowledgments of the duty of making a digest with reference to the ultimate codification of the English law. On the last point he had nothing to tell the society but what was a simple matter of vexation. It was said of Lord Bacon that when he wanted to bribe James I. into a condonation of his offences, he promised him, as the best gift he could confer on his fellow-subjects, that in three years he would make a code of English law. The promise was, of course, neglected, and yet that great man believed that which he promised to be a thing which, if done, would be ample atonement for all those offences which were laid to his charge.

As the society was well aware, a commission had been issued two or three years ago for the purpose of inquiring into the expediency of preparing a digest of the law. That commission reported that it was a thing practicable, a thing most expedient, and calculated to be most useful to the community. Unfortunately, they accompanied that statement with others which had a backward tendency, and the matter remained now, to his great regret, in a position in which the whole work had yet to be begun and performed. He was glad, however, to be able to add that he had heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer not long ago state that he thought no public money could be better expended than in the production of a digest of the law, and he trusted the work might, with these encouraging words to look to, in time be accomplished. So far as the condition of our law was concerned, we stood completely alone in the civilised world. There was not a nation in Europe that had not made in that respect greater progress. The code civile of Italy was admirable; far superior to the Code Napoleon; and why was it, he would ask, that with all our knowledge and the treasures of our experience for 300 years embodied in reports, we could not extract the gold out of the dust, cast away all the dirt by which it was encompassed, and embody it in a code which would remain to our credit without having the trouble to delve and dig for it in those masses of rubbish which were called reports? The reason why that was not done he was unable to tell, but that it ought to be done no man of common sense, entertained, he believed, the slightest doubt. It was the duty of every lawgiver not only to enact good laws, but to enact them in such a manner that the knowledge of them might be accessible to all. Was the knowledge of our law thus accessible? The people placed abundant confidence in the integrity of its administration, and deservedly so. It was that confidence that had preserved our system, for generally speaking, the unfortunate man who found himself under the necessity of going to law, felt that he was about to commit himself to some horrid unknown region, abounding in snares and pitfalls, into which he entered with fear and trembling, and rejoiced if by any chance, after years of suffering, he was emancipated from that desert and that state of bondage. Why should such a state of things be permitted to continue? As all sluggards said, there were lions in the path. But what were those lions? In answering that question he would urge on the society not to be led away by any mere idolatry of names; for there were distinguished men who talked of the non-elasticity of a code and the impossibility of deciding cases which might arise if the law were reduced to anything like definite rules. He had mentioned a short time ago in the House of Lords that when dining with the late Lord Lyndhurst, about twenty-five years ago, there being present an American lawyer of considerable reputation and several other men eminent in the law, and the conversation happening to turn on the peculiarity of our jurisdiction, Lord Lyndhurst, whether ironically or not he could not say, expressed an opinion to the effect that the highest conceivable perfection in the administration of justice was to have one court appointed to administer all the inferior rules of law, and another the superior rules of equity. He referred to that conversation merely to show that men should not permit their own free unfettered reason to be dragged at the chariot wheels of any man, however eminent he might be. In making these observations he was reminded of the story of a good Roman Catholic priest, who, being perfectly ignorant of Latin, had a breviary in which the word mumpsimus was substituted for the word sumpsimus—the printer having made a blunder. The good man having read the breviary for thirty years regularly, somebody proposed to him that the error should be corrected, but he insisted that he would not give up his mumpsimus. Mutato nomine de nobis fabula narratur. Much the same thing might with perfect truth be said of the mode in which we dealt with subjects of legal reform; but it was something to have the admission made that reform was necessary, and he trusted that we should not be long in finding a remedy for the existing evils. Leaving that subject, he would briefly advert to the law of primogeniture. The Government proposed to abolish that law. They meant to provide in cases of intestacy for an equal distribution of real property, which amounted in truth to a denial of the right of primogeniture. Now he was not at all timid as a reformer, but it was one thing to reform the law as an instrument of the judicial administration of justice, and another thing to alter the institutions of a people. We could easily alter the administration of the law by making it more economical in point of procedure, but it was a perilous thing to alter any portion of the institutions of the people at large. Our present system was derived from the great feudal principle that the polity of the country was founded on the land and made to depend on the land. The proposed change was quite a different thing from an amendment. Primogeniture, for instance, led to the sending out of the cadets of families into the world, where they won for themselves, under the pressure of necessity, great names and great fortunes. How much did not our empire in India owe to the exertions of young cadets, especially Scotch, who had left their homes under the pressure of the institution of which he was speaking? It was, indeed, said that any man might prevent the operation of the new law by making a will; but it should be borne in mind that when the inheritance of the eldest son was once stamped by the Legislature as an institution which ought not to exist, things would, under the influence of public opinion, come to assume a very different form, so that the subject was one well deserving of careful attention. The noble and learned lord in the next place touched on the promised measure of the Government with respect to the transfer of land, observing that abroad our system of uses and trusts was unknown, and that, instead of them, recourse was had to simple contract and agreement, which he said was much more effectual and infinitely less cumbrous.

Dismissing that subject, the noble and learned lord adverted to the relations between husband and wife, especially with reference to the rights of the latter with respect to property, observing that there was no doubt great room for improvement in such matters. In this country we adhered entirely to the proposition that marriage was a legal transfer to the husband of the wife's personal property as well as of the income derived from her real property. That was, however, accompanied with the condition that the gift was made in order that the husband might maintain the wife. Was that a trust in the proper sense of the word, or was it an obligation that ought to be made the condition of the gift, so that when the trust was not performed, the gift might be resumed and placed under regulations? In justice he thought it was so, and probably to that extent most of those whom he had the honour to address would be willing to accept an alteration of the law. He would, however, suggest to the members of the society that they should examine the different bills which might from time to time be introduced into Parliament on the subject, and see how it was proposed to meet the difficulty as to how far the wife was to be made to contribute to the necessities of the family. He next came to the measure which the Government had introduced on the subject of naturalisation and neutrality. He had striven for years during the Government of Lord Palmerston to procure the sanction of the principle that aliens might be permitted to hold land in this country. Lord Palmerston, however, held peculiar views on the subject, and he was unable to carry out his object. The principle was now being acted upon, and the issue would be, he hoped, the production of the best results. He begged, in conclusion, earnestly to direct the attention of the society to the various questions to which he had alluded, because the expression of the opinions of such a body upon them was the best way to secure that they should be understood, and thus a great benefit would by its means be conferred upon the community.

On the motion of Sir P. Colquhoun, seconded by Mr. N. Higgins, a vote of thanks was unanimously passed to the noble and learned lord at the close of his address, and the proceedings terminated.

THE SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The usual monthly meeting of the board of directors of this association was held at the Law Institution, London, on Wednesday last, the 6th inst. Amongst other business transacted a donation of £50 was granted to the distressed widow of a member, and a sum of £20 was distributed in relief of necessitous families of deceased non-members. Eight new members were admitted to the association, and Mr. William Hine Haycock, of London, was elected a member of the board in the room of the late Mr. Thos. Harrison.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At the quarterly meeting of this society, held on the 5th inst., Mr. E. C. Harvie in the chair, the Secretary presented his report of the proceedings of the society during the preceding quarter, from which it appeared that during the quarter there had been twelve meetings, at which six legal and four jurisprudential questions had been discussed; that the average attendance had been twenty-six, and the average number of speakers ten; and that the number of members on the rolls was 164. The number of members present at the meeting was 29.

LAW UNION FIRE AND LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

The third quinquennial meeting of the shareholders of this company was held on Thursday, at the office, Chancery-lane; James Cuddon, Esq., the deputy-chairman of the company, presiding.

Mr. F. McGedy (the actuary and secretary) read the notice convening the meeting, and the minutes of the last annual meeting, which were confirmed. The report and balance-sheet, having been circulated, were taken as read.

The Chairman said:—Gentlemen, I might well content myself with at once moving the adoption of the report of the directors now before you, and which has been in your hands for some days, seeing that such report is most explicit and full of information as to the company's affairs, and so plain and clear that it can scarcely be misunderstood; but it is usual for the person who presides at a meeting such as this to offer some observations. At a time like the present, when the safety of life insurance companies has been publicly so much discussed, I do not think I can do better than invite you to consider how the safety of an insurance company should be evidenced. Firstly, I think it is necessary that proper rates be fixed; secondly, that all proposals should be carefully examined into, and that such as appear undesirable should be rejected; thirdly, that the money received from premiums should be employed in sound and solid investments; fourthly, that there should be a steady amount of new business, and that there should be a sufficient number of good lives assured to form a fair and proper average; fifthly, that all unnecessary or extravagant expenditure should be carefully avoided; sixthly, that the office accounts should not only be kept in an accurate manner, but also should be frequently tested; and, seventhly, that in computing profits at the periods fixed for division, the strictest investigation should take place on all points; moreover, that the liabilities should be estimated by the highest scale, and the assets stated at the lowest reasonable value. Now, I should be glad if you would follow me in testing the soundness of our company in each of these seven particulars. Firstly, as to the tabular rates being sufficient. They are not only such as, in the opinion of skilful actuaries, suffice in theory, but they have been proved to be more than sufficient by the experience of many first-class companies, acquired during a long series of years. Unless, therefore, the whole system of life insurance is merely speculative and experience useless, we are on solid ground as to our tabular rates. Secondly, the office accounts show that numerous proposals for large aggregate sums have been declined in every one of the fifteen years during which the company has been established. These proposals were declined after proper investigation, and this fact is, I submit, good evidence that business has not been accepted merely for the sake of doing business. If any error has been committed, it has been one of timidity rather than of boldness. The present bonus would certainly have been somewhat increased but for the fact of our having paid away much money for reassurances, which, as it has turned out, might have been well retained—but it is easy to be wise after the event. Thirdly, as to the investments. Each proposal for investment is separately investigated and considered by a committee of gentlemen whose daily avocations eminently qualify them to judge as to the soundness of a security. No securities are taken which are not marketable. Not a shilling is lent on mere personal security—no foreign securities are entertained. Land and houses, carefully valued, reversions to, or life interests in, Government funds, or in real estate, or policies of insurance in first class offices—these are the securities in which the company's funds are invested. Fourthly, that there is a steady and good amount of new business, is proved by the fact that it has during the last five years averaged upwards of £7,000 per annum—an amount which is not only highly satisfactory, but far more than could have been reasonably anticipated. The number of lives now assured exceeds 2,000, an ample number for an average. Perhaps where a much larger number of lives is assured, there may be greater certainty against a variation of mortality in a single year, but this is unimportant, as our averages are made up for each series of five years—a period of time amply sufficient to correct the aberration of one or even two years. Fifthly, as to expenditure. Our officials are not overpaid—I think they are fairly paid—but certainly not overpaid, nor is there a person in the employment of the company whose time is not fully occupied. Public attention has been of late drawn to the question of commissions to agents. It is the rule of the best offices, with some, though with but few exceptions, to allow commissions. I can only say that this question has two aspects. I could show that in this office our payments to all the agents for commission during an entire year have been more than compensated for by the benefits derived from investments introduced through their connection, and from information obtained from them in reference to matters within their knowledge, which we consider the payment of commission entitles the company to ask for when needed, and which information is generally given without cost. It is not usual for clients to pay costs in reference to the trouble their solicitors have as to effecting life insurances, and this fact doubtless gave rise to the allowance of commissions—a system which it would now be exceedingly difficult to break through. The allowance of commission certainly largely increases the business, and therefore the profits, and I think in a sufficient proportion to recoup the amount disbursed for commission. Sixthly, an investigation of the books shows a regular and safe system of accounts. Those accounts are gone into monthly by an eminent firm of accountants, and are again examined by the auditors,—no greater security against mistakes or errors of any kind could, I think, be devised. Lastly, the certificate of Mr. Samuel Brown, the eminent actuary, the president of the Institute of Actuaries, is before you. Can anything be more explicit? Is any more rigid system of valuation adopted by any company? I think not. The highest estimate is put upon the liabilities, while the assets are certainly underestimated. In proof of this I may mention that three reversions which have fallen in, producing a profit of several thousand pounds, have been treated as reversions still; the exact amount to be paid to the company not having yet been ascertained, I do not see how anything could be more satisfactory in this most important of all points. The directors are perfectly satisfied with the correctness of Mr. McGedy's valuation, having in him entire confidence. But they thought to make assurance doubly sure, it was better to obtain the revision of Mr. S. Brown, one of the most eminent men in the profession, and one in whom the whole insurance world has the most implicit reliance. Much stress has been laid in recent discussions in the papers upon the possession of very large funds in hand. It must be borne in mind that no large funds in hand can arise except from a large amount of premiums, and a large amount of premiums involves a corresponding liability. The resources of an insurance company must be viewed in point of security in comparison with its liabilities. Let us take our valuation, and suppose all the figures multiplied ten-fold, so that we divided amongst the assured a cash bonus of £190,000, instead of £19,000, how much better would the bonus be? Not a bit better; for there would of course be ten times the number of persons, with ten times the amount assured, between whom it would be divisible. The effect would be the same with regard to each individual. The bonus now proposed to be declared is equal to a reversionary bonus of £1 5s. per cent. per annum on the sum assured, or taking the average rate of premium at three per cent., is equal to a reversionary bonus of about forty per cent. on the premiums paid since the last division. It may be said that when the funds are very large the expenses fall much more lightly in proportion. This is true; but when you have to find securities for a very large fund, it is hardly possible to obtain the same rate of interest as for a moderate fund—a difference of a quarter or even an eighth per cent. in the average rate of interest on the funds invested frequently more than counterbalances the advantage of a less percentage of expenses. I do not underrate the possession of large funds, but I say that it should not be taken for granted that such possession affords either better security or a larger bonus to each individual life assured. A small frigate, even in rough weather, is generally considered quite as safe as a hundred and twenty gun ship. You will have heard with regret of the death of the late solicitor, Mr. Durrant, and you will observe in the report a recommendation to vote £400 to his widow. This lady is young, in a bad state of health, and has a large family. I trust, under the circumstances mentioned in the report, that this sum of £400 will be cheerfully voted. The amount and circumstances have been well considered by the board. Mr. Burges, who was a director, but who resigned his seat at the board, has been selected as solicitor on the ground of his being eminently qualified to fill that office. His well-known abilities and high standing in his profession will, I am sure, be duly appreciated by all parties interested. His previous intimate knowledge of the company's affairs cannot fail to prove of great advantage. As to the fire department, we have found that the largest profit is not derived from the highest premiums, and that the caution and prudence exercised have well answered our expectations. I feel sure that every shareholder will be well satisfied with the proposed twelve per cent. dividend and bonus, especially as fifteen per cent. is, in fact, also added to the paid-up capital; and besides this, a reserve of more than five per cent. remains towards the future dividend and bonus account. If any gentleman wishes to make any remarks, I shall be happy to give all the information in my power before moving the adoption of this report.

No one rising, the Chairman moved that the report be adopted.

Mr. PEMBERTON seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. J. STONE moved "That the recommendation of the directors in their report now read, as to the payment of a dividend and bonus, be adopted, and that a dividend and bonus together, after the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, free of income tax, be paid to the shareholders on the paid-up capital for the fourteen months ending the 30th of November, 1870."

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. E. B. HOOKE, seconded by Mr. THEODORE WATERHOUSE, the retiring directors, as follows, were re-elected, namely, Messrs. J. H. Blood, E. Burkitt, Jas. Cuddon, W. Docker, Hy. Heffill, H. T. Johns, H. Munster, Jno. Nanson, H. W. Parker, Wm. Parsons, Chas. Pemberton, H. T. Sankey, George Thomas, and H. S. Wasbrough.

Mr. R. W. ROBERTS proposed, and Mr. BOND seconded, the re-election of Mr. Theodore Waterhouse as shareholders' auditor for the ensuing year, and it was carried nem. con.

The CHAIRMAN proposed that Mr. Francis Worsley be re-elected as directors' auditor for the ensuing year.

Mr. F. R. WARD, in seconding the motion, remarked that they were much indebted to their auditors for the services they rendered to the company. As a director, he felt it incumbent upon him to make this reference to them, because those who knew the way in which they discharged their duties could not fail to appreciate their efforts.

This resolution was also carried unanimously.

Mr. E. S. MOUNSEY moved "That the sum of £1,500 per annum be voted to the directors, to commence from the current financial year; and having respect to the past year, that the sum of £350 be voted to them in addition to the sum of £1,250 already received." He mentioned that the London directors had, in the aggregate, given 1,200 attendances during the year.

Mr. SCHULTZ seconded the resolution, and it was at once carried.

On the motion of Mr. JOSEPH STONE, seconded by Mr. HUISE, the sum of 50 guineas was voted to each of the auditors for his services during the past year.

Mr. C. A. SWINBURNE then proposed a resolution authorising the grant of £400 to the widow of the late Mr. G. J. Durrant, in recognition of the value of the services rendered to the company by Mr. Durrant, as their solicitor from the commencement.

Mr. FREDERICK PARKER seconded the proposition, and it was at once acceded to.

The CHAIRMAN moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Burges, the solicitor; Mr. McGedy, the secretary; and all the officials in the office.

Mr. C. PEMBERTON.—I have much pleasure in seconding the motion.

Mr. F. R. WARD suggested that the resolution should include the heads of departments under Mr. McGedy—namely, Mr. Isaac Rogers, head of the fire department, and Mr. William Stower, head of the life department, to whom, he thought, they were greatly indebted.

The resolution, with this addition, was then put, and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. MCGEDY returned thanks.

Professor ERASMUS WILSON proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman of the meeting.

Mr. H. HANCOCK seconded the proposition, and it was carried with unanimity.

The CHAIRMAN returned thanks.

RULES OF COURT

MADE IN PURSUANCE OF THE

BANKRUPTCY REPEAL AND INSOLVENT COURT ACT, 1869 (32 & 33 VICT. C. 83).

Definition of Terms.

1. The words and terms defined by the general rules made in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, to have certain meanings shall, for the purposes of the Act in respect of which these rules are made, except as herein provided, have similar or analogous meanings, unless the context implies a contrary intention.

"The Act" shall mean the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act, 1869.

"Court" shall mean the London Bankruptcy Court, or any court having jurisdiction in insolvency.

"Judge" shall mean the chief judge in bankruptcy, or any judge or deputy judge of any county court having jurisdiction in insolvency.

"Registrar" shall mean the registrar of any county court, or his lawful deputy.

"The Receiver" shall mean the receiver of the late Insolvent Debtors Court.

"The Provisional Assignee" shall mean the provisional or official assignee of the estate and effects of any person who has taken the benefit of any Act for relief of insolvent debtors in England, or the person for the time being appointed to perform the remaining duties of those offices.

"The Examiner" shall mean the examiner of the late Insolvent Debtors Court.

Practice.

2. The rules of practice and orders of the late Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors in England in force at the time of the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, shall, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with these rules, be the rules and orders for the regulation of the practice and proceedings for the carrying out of the Act.

Delegation of Powers.

3. During vacation, or during the illness or absence from any reasonable cause of the chief judge in bankruptcy, the registrar in attendance for the time being has by virtue of these rules, delegated to him all the powers and duties of such judge.

4. The chief judge in bankruptcy may delegate to the registrars of his court such of the powers vested in him by the Act as such judge may deem expedient to delegate, except the power to make an order to commit a person for contempt.

5. The judge of a county court may delegate to a registrar of his court, but to no other officer, such of the powers vested in him by the Act as he may deem expedient to delegate, except the power to make an order to commit a person for contempt.

6. Every order made by a registrar while acting under any delegated power, shall have the same force and validity as an order made by the judge, but the registrar may, if he shall think fit, adjourn any matter for the opinion of the judge.

Adjournment.

7. The examiner or registrar may, if he think fit, or at the request of any party, adjourn any matter coming before him for the consideration of the judge.

Proceedings.

8. In matters of insolvency the proceedings shall, subject to these rules, be in the forms hitherto adopted.

Affidavits.

9. Affidavits shall be written on foolscap, quarter margin, and shall be intituled according to the form in the schedule.

Affidavits may be sworn before the examiner or any other officer appointed to take oaths in the court as heretofore, or before any commissioner for taking oaths in Chancery or at common law, or before a magistrate.

Applications to the Court.

10. Applications to the court shall be intituled in the same form as affidavits, and shall be according to the form in the schedule hereto, unless the Act under which the application is made otherwise directs.

Examination of Insolvent Debtors.

11. Application for an order for the further examination of an insolvent debtor touching his estate and effects, shall be made in the form hereinbefore provided for other applications, and shall state precisely the grounds on which the same is made, and be supported by affidavit, and shall in the first instance be ex parte, for a rule to show cause, and such rule may be granted by the judge or registrar.

Rules and Orders.

12. Rules and orders shall be sealed with the seal of the London Bankruptcy Court, or with the seal of a county court exercising jurisdiction in insolvency, and shall be signed by the examiner or registrar, as the case may be. Orders for payment of money out of the late Insolvent Debtors Court shall also be signed by the chief judge, unless he is absent on vacation or on account of illness, then they shall be signed by the registrar in attendance.

Appeal.

13. Any decision or order made by the chief judge shall be subject to an appeal to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and any decision or order of the judge of a county court shall be subject in the first instance to an appeal to the chief judge.

14. An appeal shall be entered within twenty-one days after such decision or order shall have been made, and if no appeal be entered within that time, the said decision or order shall be final.

15. At the time of entering an appeal notice thereof shall be given by the appellant to the court appealed from, by leaving the same in writing with the examiner or registrar aforesaid, who shall forthwith file the same with the proceedings; and a similar notice shall be delivered to the respondent seven clear days before the day appointed for hearing.

16. At or before the time of entering an appeal, the party intending to appeal shall deposit with the examiner or registrar aforesaid such sum, not being less than ten pounds, and not exceeding forty pounds, as the court appealed from shall direct, to satisfy, so far as the same may extend, any costs the appellant may be ordered to pay; and in the absence of any such direction the sum deposited shall be twenty pounds.

17. Where there are several respondents in separate interests, the court may, if it think fit, direct a separate deposit to be made as to every such respondent.

The Receiver.

18. The receiver shall find, for the proper discharge of his duties, sureties to the extent of £6,000, and shall, together with such sureties, execute a joint and several bond to the chief judge and his successors; or he may give the security of a guarantee society for the said amount of £6,000, to be approved by the judge, and to be deposited with the comptroller.

19. In the bond the receiver shall be made liable to the whole amount, and the sureties shall guarantee the payment thereof in such proportions as shall be approved by the judge.

20. The receiver shall, on pain of dismissal, give immediate notice in writing to the comptroller of the death, bankruptcy, or insolvency of any or either of his sureties, and shall forthwith cause a new bond to be executed to the like amount by other sureties, to be approved of as above.

21. The receiver shall on the first day of January in every year, or within one week thereafter, make a declaration in writing and file it with the comptroller, that to the best of his knowledge and belief his sureties are alive and solvent, and state therein any change of residence of any or either such sureties, or he shall deposit with the comptroller the last receipt for premium paid, showing that the guarantee bond remains in force.

22. The receiver shall keep at the Bank of England the monies transferred to him under the provisions of the Act, and with the monies so transferred, and all monies hereafter received by him as receiver, open and keep an account there, to be intitled "The account of the late Insolvent Debtors Court." The said account shall not be used by the receiver for his private purposes.

23. When the quarterly account of the receiver shall show that the cash balance standing to the credit of the account kept by the receiver at the Bank of England, intitled "The account of the late Insolvent Debtors Court," exceeds the sum of £6,000, he shall transfer any excess over the sum of £5,000 (exclusive of any fraction of a pound) to the account of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and shall give the Treasury and the said Commissioners notice of such transfer being made, and the consolidated fund shall be liable to the extent of the excess so transferred to make good any sum of cash due in respect of the estate of insolvent debtors.

24. Whenever the cash balance standing to the credit of the said account is less than £2,000, the Treasury shall forthwith, on the certificate of the receiver, to be approved and countersigned by the chief judge, cause to be paid into the Bank of England to the credit of the account intitled "The account of the late Insolvent Debtors Court," such sum out of the growing produce of the consolidated fund, as may be required to make up such balance to the sum of £5,000, or such other sum as may from time to time be fixed by the treasury and the Lord Chancellor.

The Accounts of the Provisional Assignee and other Officers.

25. The provisional assignee and the receiver, and any other officer of the late Insolvent Debtors Court who receives public monies, shall, once in every quarter of a year deliver to the comptroller an account in duplicate, made up to the last day of the preceding month, of his receipts and payments on account of the estates of insolvent debtors, together with his cash book and his banker's pass book duly made up and balanced, and any other books in his possession or control which may be required.

26. The accounts of the provisional assignee and the receiver and of the officers aforesaid shall be audited by the comptroller, or such person as he (with the sanction of the judge) shall appoint, and when audited shall be signed by the comptroller, if the same be approved, and the said accounts shall thereupon be treated as passed.

Creditors Assignees Account.

27. The person performing the duties of the provisional or official assignee may in any case, and at any time not earlier than three months from the date of the appointment of a creditors' assignee, apply to him (and so from time to time until it shall appear that the estate is wound up and the insolvency closed) for an account of his receipts and payments.

28. The application shall be made in the form in the schedule, and shall, together with the form of account and affidavit in the schedule, be sent by post.

29. If the said assignee shall not file an account and affidavit as aforesaid within fourteen days after he shall have been applied to for the same, the person performing the duties aforesaid may apply to the court for a rule calling on him to show cause why he should not do so, or be committed to prison for contempt of court, and why he should not pay the costs of, and occasioned by his default.

Closing of Cases.

30. Application to the court for postponing the close of an insolvency shall be made in the form hereinbefore provided for other applications, and shall in the first instance be ex parte for a rule to show cause. An affidavit must be filed in support disclosing a prima facie case that the insolvent debtor is entitled to property other than that already vested in the assignee under the insolvency, and the nature of such property, and in whose possession the same is, or is supposed to be. A copy of the order, if any, made on such application must be served on the insolvent debtor or his representative and any other parties intended to be bound or affected thereby in such manner as the judge shall direct. When an order postponing the close of an insolvency shall be made, the practice heretofore adopted for making property available for creditors, where such property did not pass to the assignee under the vesting order or petition (as the case may be), shall be followed.

Winding up of Business.

31. Assignees shall, as expeditiously as possible, wind up estates vested in them respectively, and where any property vested in an assignee, whether in possession, reversion, or remainder, remains undisposed of after the insolvency shall have been closed, the assignee shall apply to the court for directions as to the realisation or sale thereof.

32. The creditors whose names are contained in the schedule of an insolvent debtor shall have notice of such application, which notice shall be sent to them by the proper officer of the court by post, according to their addresses in the schedule.

33. Where the person performing the duties of the provisional or official assignee is of opinion that the winding up of an estate is delayed through the conduct of a creditor's assignee, such person may apply to the court to remove such assignee, and to appoint him assignee in the place of such creditors' assignee.

Production of Records.

34. Petitions, vesting orders, and all other orders and proceedings in court, shall upon payment of the usual fees, be produced to the insolvent debtor, a creditor, or the attorney of either.

Office Copies.

35. Copies of the above records and proceedings, or any of them, shall be furnished to the persons aforesaid on payment of the usual fees for the same, provided that the judge, or the examiner or registrar aforesaid, shall have power to order the production of such records and the furnishing of copies to any other person on being satisfied that the party applying for the same is reasonably entitled thereto, and upon payment of the usual fees.

Taxation of Costs.

36. No order for payment of bills of costs out of the estate of an insolvent debtor, other than the costs of audit which may be allowed by the examiner or registrar, shall be made without taxation; and, except in county court cases, until the solicitor of the late Insolvent Debtors Court shall have had due notice of the appointment to tax, who shall attend such taxation if he think it expedient to do so.

STAMPS.

Until the Lord Chancellor by order directs that fees shall be taken by means of stamps, all fees shall be payable in money and accounted for as the Treasury shall, from time to time, direct.

To E. F.

Provisional (or official) assignee.

N.B.—Every assignee is required, at the end of three months, at the farthest, from the time of his appointment, to make up an account of the estate and effects of which he is assignee, with specific dates of all payments and receipts, and to make oath in writing before any person before whom affidavits are directed to be sworn, that such account contains a fair, just, and particular account of such estate and effects got in by or for such assignee, and of all payments necessarily made or deducted therefrom, and of all expenses sought to be allowed in respect thereof, up to the time of filing such account, and to file such account so sworn, together with a minute concerning the probable assets of the estate (if any), at the late court above mentioned.

In case no property or effects have been realised or received by the assignee, the word "nil" must be written on both sides of the account before it is signed, and the said account and the accompanying form of affidavit must be filled up, sworn to, and returned to me as (provisional or official) assignee, whether any estate has been realised or not. A form of account and affidavit is enclosed, and take notice that you will be liable to be committed to prison for contempt of court if you fail to comply with the above directions.

An account of all moneys received and paid by E. F., of —, assignee of the estate and effects of A. B., an insolvent debtor, to the — day of —, 18— inclusive.

This is the account referred to in the affidavit of E. F., sworn before me
R.S.

N.B.—The law costs are to be claimed in the account, subject to taxation, to be made before the day appointed for audit, but the amount is not to be carried out.

Affidavit.

I, E. F., make oath and say as follows:—

1. That I was on the — day of —, 18—, appointed creditors' assignee of the estate and effects of the above-named insolvent debtor, and that as such assignee I have conducted the realisation of the said estate.

2. That the accounts hereto annexed, containing — sheets of paper, the first sheet whereof is marked with the letter A, is true, and such account contains entries of every sum of money received by me on account of the estate and effects of the above-named insolvent debtor, [if a previous account has been filed, and since the — day of —, 18—, here insert the date of the filing of such previous account,] and that the payments purporting in such account to have been made by me have been so made.

3. That the reason why I have not previously filed my account in the late Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors is (here state the reason).

4. That as such assignee as aforesaid, I have not, and no other person or persons has or have by my order, or with my knowledge, received or paid on my account as such assignee any monies on account of the said estate.

E. F.

Sworn at —, in the county of —, the — day of —, 18—,

Before me,

Minute concerning the probable assets of the estate. (See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 62.)

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

There have been few fluctuations in the price of public securities during the week. And during the latter part of the week, notwithstanding somewhat unfavourable reports from the Paris Bourse and some other capitals, the fine weather has exercised a very favourable influence over all markets, and the funds have shown an upward tendency.

The market for railway stocks and shares was dull at the beginning of the week, but has shown greatly increased firmness the last few days.

The demand for money has been moderate, the supply being fairly abundant.

LAWYERS AND LAW CHARGES.—A bill has been introduced in the House of Commons providing that the remuneration of attorneys and solicitors may be fixed by agreements with their clients. The agreement is to exclude all further claims by the attorney in respect to the conduct of the business in reference to which it is made. If this bill becomes law, some of the abuses referred to in the article in the February part would be remedied. That article has been subjected to professional criticism, the justice of which, on some points, the editor freely acknowledges. In stating some practices which are on all hands condemned, the writer guarded against application being made to the profession generally. But the tone of the article having given umbrage to legal readers, the editor regrets that the censures were not more specifically limited to certain abuses. We have received some specimens of solicitors' charges, the bare publication of which would explain our meaning. Speaking broadly of solicitors and attorneys as a class, they form an honourable profession, numbering in its ranks thousands who are as upright and conscientious as any class of the community. As to the expenses of conveyancing, and the forms of drawing up bills the law itself is answerable, with the usages of the profession. To effect reform in these usages is the object of the bill before Parliament at the time when we are writing. Mr. Rathbone (M.P. for Liverpool) in moving the second reading of the bill said it was unnecessary to detain the House at any length, as "the present mode of remunerating attorneys and solicitors was universally condemned. It was marvellous that there should have existed so long a method of remunerating men by the length of their documents and the number of items they could put into their bills. Such a system of charge was offensive to every high-minded practitioner, while it gave an opportunity to the greedy and unscrupulous to fleece their clients." Having shown how the present system hindered measures of law amendment, especially in regard to mortgage and conveyance of property, Mr. Rathbone explained that the bill would permit attorneys and clients to come to agreement for a fixed remuneration, safeguards being introduced to prevent attorneys from taking advantage of the ignorance or inexperience of clients. Taxing masters ought to consider not merely the current usages as to charges, but to estimate the skill, labour, and responsibility in each case. They should have power to remedy wrongs, even after the payment of a solicitor's account. Trustees ought also to be allowed remuneration for legal services to clients. A trustee at present is not entitled to make professional charges in that capacity.—Leisure Hour.

SANE ENOUGH.—An Ohio murderer, who escaped conviction on the plea of insanity, now refuses to pay his lawyers for the same reason.

In a suit for divorce recently tried before Judge Patchen, of Detroit, it was decided that a farm should be equally divided between the severed couple, on the ground that the woman, by her hard work, had done as much as the man to acquire the property.

Mr. E. H. Bennett, of Boston, author of "Leading Criminal Cases," and of the "Massachusetts Digest," is preparing for the press a new edition of "Storey on Bailments."

A recent verdict of a Boston jury, that lager beer was not intoxicating, has been set aside by Judge Lord, of the supreme court of Massachusetts.—Chicago Legal News.

LONDON, APRIL 16, 1870.

MR. LOWE IS GOING TO REDUCE the 35s. deed stamp to 10s., and abolish "followers"—a change which in itself will be a great boon, especially to purchasers of small properties. We may, however, note in passing that the progressive duty now to be abolished operated to some extent to check verbosity, and now that it is to be done away with it is more than ever expedient that the absurd method of remunerating conveyancing by mere length, inconvenient to the client—but how much more unjust to the conveyancer—should no longer be kept up. Mr. Lowe also proposes to make us another present by halving the double duty on transfers of copyhold tenements. All these alterations are to be conditional on the House passing, without discussing the merits of existing stamps, Mr. Lowe's bill to consolidate that indigesta moles, the Stamp Acts. This proposal is made in an amusing and characteristic tone, but is not in itself unreasonable. A consolidating Act is very much needed, and presuming that, with the exceptions above-mentioned, this bill will be nothing more, we hope its progress will not be obstructed; but it should be scrutinised carefully in order that nothing ultra pactum may be permitted to slip in.

THE DIRECTORS OF THE BRIGHTON and other railway companies have presented to the House of Commons a petition (which we print in another column) praying that the amount of compensation payable to passengers may be limited, and that all claims for compensation for accidents may be compulsorily referred to arbitrators appointed by the Board of Trade. The arguments of the petitioners are much the same as those contained in Mr. Joseph Brown's pamphlet, which we noticed at length a few weeks ago, though they scarcely put their own case so well as he did. Their case is that it is contrary to all commercial principles that companies should be compelled to enter into contracts attended with the risk of heavy damages, without being allowed to make such charges as may reasonably cover the risk. The petitioners appear to assume that the maximum fares which they are now entitled to charge are not sufficiently reasonable to cover the risk—a statement which, as we pointed out before, requires further proof than the mere fact of a small dividend affords. Granting, however, that this is so, the argument only shows that the maximum ought to be raised so as to allow of charges being made which will reasonably cover the risk, and does not show at all that the risk should be thrown on the passengers instead of on the companies. A further argument is drawn by the petitioners from the fact that in the case of workmen's trains on the Metropolitan, London, Chatham, & Dover, and Great Eastern railways, under certain special Acts, the compensation to passengers is limited to £100. In these cases, however, the fares are exceptionally low, and the persons who take the workmen's tickets of course take the risk on themselves in consideration of the reduced fare at which they travel. This, therefore, does not touch what we consider the main question—viz., are the fares now too low reasonably to cover the risk? Besides which these provisions were contained in special Acts, and though the clauses were discussed before committees, yet this is a very different thing from a principle established by a public bill. In fact these clauses really represent the terms of the bargain by which the companies in question obtained compulsory powers to turn out working men from their dwellings.

As regards the second part of the prayer of the petition—viz., for compulsorily referring claims for compensation to arbitrators chosen by the Board of Trade—we think the case of the petitioners a very weak one. They do not even propose to confine it to cases where they admit liability and only dispute the amount. Indeed, they clearly do not propose to do so, as they suggest that arbitrators would be better able to distinguish between true and fraudulent claims. Why they should be so we are unable to imagine. Cases of fraud are usually considered to be essentially cases for juries, and not for arbitrators. Upon this point, again, the petitioners refer to the fact that such a tribunal (viz., arbitrators appointed by the Board of Trade) already exists in cases where both parties consent, under sections 25 and 26 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868. It would be a good test of the popularity of the tribunal to ascertain how often it has been resorted to. We never heard of a case, and much doubt whether there has ever been one.

A RECENT NUMBER of the American Law Review contains an article on the Law of Insanity which will highly please our medical friends and critics. The writer advances the proposition that there is no such a thing properly speaking, as the law of insanity, and that the whole question is merely a question of fact to be decided by the jury; or rather it is contended that two questions of fact are involved—first, was the party labouring under mental disease; and secondly, was the act in question the offspring of that disease. This appears to have been laid down by one judge in New Hampshire, in charging a jury, and by another judge in the full court dissenting from the opinion of the majority. It is obvious that, as applied to criminal cases, it involves the assumption that all acts which are the offspring of mental disease of any kind are unpunishable by law. This is not, as our readers are all aware, the law in this country; neither does it appear to be so yet in America.

It is, of course, a question of fact to be decided by a jury, when it arises, according to the light thrown upon it by the best medical opinions they can obtain, whether the party was or is suffering from mental disease. What the effect of the mental disease as to rendering his acts unpunishable in a criminal court, or invalid in a civil court, depends, however, according to our law upon the extent and nature of the mental disease. And thus a question of law is introduced upon which the jury should be instructed, and told, in fact, whether the mere existence of mental disease in any form is material to the cause they have to try. Another judge in America has adopted again a different test. He lays stress on the word power, as distinguished from capacity, the word more frequently used by lawyers, and states the question to be—Has the defendant power to distinguish right from wrong, and power to adhere to the right and avoid the wrong? This, probably, is an improvement upon the ordinary definition, and certainly covers all cases in which the act of the defendant ought to go unpunished. The only objection to the definition being adopted is that it is liable to misapprehension by juries, who might be likely to consider it as including cases really of want of strength and not of want of power.

THE "SMALL-POX RIOTS" at White Waltham have been pronounced by the Maidenhead justices not to be riots at all. The decision may appear somewhat strange at first sight, but it is not indefensible when all the circumstances of the case are fairly looked at. It seems that Mr. Ephraim Davey, clerk to the Local Board for the Maidenhead district, knowing that a temporary small-pox hospital was wanted by the board, took of a Mr. John Palmer a house at White Waltham for that purpose. He gave £30 a-year for it and meant to re-let it to the Board for £60. On the afternoon of the day from which his tenancy commenced (the 25th March), he put a man in possession to light the fires, to put the rooms into a proper condition for the reception of the patients and to "ventilate" the premises. Meanwhile, the people of White Waltham had discovered the fact that their new neighbours were to be small-pox patients, and naturally they did not much relish the prospect. To mark their displeasure they certainly adopted somewhat violent and unusual means. Twenty-five to thirty men appeared on the night of the 25th in the enclosure in front of the house, and set to work to ventilate the place in good earnest. They smashed most of the windows and broke in some of the doors. The result was that they were charged before the magistrates with riotously demolishing Mr. Palmer's house. The defence was that there had been no riot and no intention absolutely to demolish the house. The bench considered that neither was there any riot proved nor any intention on the part of the defendants to completely destroy Mr. Palmer's premises. It seems to us that on both points their decision was correct. The defendants doubtless came together for an unlawful purpose, but as their proceedings did not inspire terror in the minds of any body, they could scarcely be deemed "rioters" (1 Hawkins, P. C. c. 65, s. 5). Nor, again, was their ultimate object the total demolition of the house; and that being so, the window and door breaking was not a "commencement to demolish" within the meaning of the statute under which they were proceeded against (R. v. Thomas, 4 C. & P. 337; R. v. Adams, C. & M. 299). The proceedings of the defendants were not justifiable, but did not furnish the ground of criminal proceedings. It may be that they subjected themselves to a civil liability, but, under the circumstances, the magistrates were right in holding that they had not been guilty of a criminal offence. It is the fashion to deride "justices' justice," and we have often in this journal commented on the eccentricities of the unpaid magistracy. But in this case, at all events, the decision arrived at was, we believe, in strict accordance with the authorities. The remedy of Mr. Palmer, if he has any, must be sought by a civil action.

IT APPEARS that the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the celebrated "Legal Tender" case of *Hepburn v. Griswold is to be reopened. The Supreme Court has concluded to hear the arguments over again. We have no information as to the grounds on which this, which to English lawyers appears a singular proceeding, is ostensibly based, nor do we know how common or uncommon such a treatment of a Supreme Court decision may be. But the whole affair confirms the belief that the powers that be have resolved that at all hazards the obnoxious judgment which proclaimed the Legal Tender Act ultra vires shall be reversed. It was said shortly after the delivery of the judgment that the powers aforesaid made no secret of their determination to provide some new judges of a more servile pattern than Chief Justice Chase and the colleagues who agreed with him. The new judges were elected, took their seats, and by their votes was carried the resolution to revise the obnoxious decision. This style of proceeding will tend to make the Erie shareholders rather doubtful of their chances of getting justice from the New York courts. Altogether the Americans appear very decidedly a go-ahead people. Financial operators in the old country can cook accounts very skilfully, but in America they cook the judges, and are considering, it is thought, the feasibility of cooking the Legislature.

Apropos of the legal tender question the Supreme Court has recently delivered another decision in pari materia, in a case of which a report will be found in another column. There a contract had been entered into before the Act, by which a lessee had the option of purchase at a certain price. The lessee exercised the option after the Act, but the Court, holding that the terms of purchase related back in all respects to the date of the original contract, at which time bullion was the only currency, ruled that a tender of the price in legal tender notes was not sufficient, and that the lessee could claim specific performance only on the terms of paying in bullion.

THE DEBTORS ACT, 1869, is beginning to bear fruit, some of it of a kind not likely to have been contemplated by its authors. From several cases which have been before certain London county courts during the last few days, it appears that a person who incurs a debt by fraud is often safer from punishment than a person who has incurred a debt honestly. If ability to pay subsequent to the judgment can be shown, of course the judge may commit, but if the debt has been incurred by fraud, and the debtor can conceal his place of employment or mode of earning a livelihood, he is beyond the reach of the jurisdiction of the court. In London and other large places there are always numerous people who can and do conceal their means of living, and when they are allowed to get into debt they are, practically irresponsible, even though the debt be fraudulent. It is true that section 13 renders such a debtor liable to a year's imprisonment, but the provision must of necessity be a dead letter in the vast majority of cases. The fraudulent debts sued for in county courts are chiefly those of collectors of rents, &c., and consist of money received by the defendants and not accounted for. The employer of the delinquent collector has, it may be said, two courses open to him: he may prosecute for fraud under section 13 and send his debtor to prison, but in that case he will only be "throwing good money after bad," in addition to his loss of time; or he may sue in the county court, on the chance that some time before the expiration of six years after obtaining judgment it may be possible to prove that the defendant has the means to pay; but, having taken one course, it is not open to him to take the other. Very few creditors will involve themselves in the trouble and annoyance of the first course, including as it does an examination before magistrates and a subsequent trial by a jury; and the only alternative is the county court, which is completely powerless so long as the delinquent collector has not, or conceals the fact that he has, the means to pay. The common practice of the county courts, when making orders of committal, is to hold the warrant over if certain conditions as to future payment of instalments are complied with; but even this lenient method of obtaining a debt is not now available against the small fry of fraudulent debtors. In this respect the change in the law has been in favour of the rogues.

IT IS AN OLD and well-established doctrine that contracts in restraint of trade are void. Recent cases have, however, excepted from this rule contracts made for a valuable consideration if in partial restraint only and reasonable. What is reasonable must of course depend upon the nature of the trade, the position of the contracting parties, and all the surrounding circumstances. This rule has recently been carried very far in America in a case of Wright v. Ryder, in the Supreme Court of California. There the California Steam Navigation Company sold one of their vessels to the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, and the Oregon Company covenanted as part of the contract of sale that they would not employ the vessel or her machinery in any part of the waters of California during ten years. This covenant was held to be void as in restraint of trade.

The Court recognised and cited the English cases, and treated the law of England and America as being the same on this point. They seem, however, to have applied the rule more strictly than would have been done in England. A contract not to employ in a specified place a particular vessel for a limited time is certainly only in partial restraint of trade, even although the restrictions extended to the whole state, and this decision follows, therefore, the narrow rules of the older cases rather than the more liberal principles of the later authorities.

THE BUSINESS on the Western Circuit was brought to a close on Saturday last after an unusually protracted assize. The only noticeable features on the circuit were the prosecutions arising out of the Bridgwater Election Commission, and the very small total number of causes tried—namely, 49; which, with the Bridgwater informations, made up a total of 53 cases—17 special jury and 36 common. This number is below the usual average; but we are unable to point to any particular circumstances contributing to this result, which is probably due to the general depression. Bristol contributed the largest number of cases—namely, 17; while Devizes contributed but one.

The prisoners whose names appeared in the calendars for the six counties and Bristol made a grand total of 262, and we are enabled to give an analysis of the degree of education of these prisoners, with the exception of 45, who, having been bailed on committal, have a blank against their names in the column devoted to degree of instruction. Taking the remaining 217 prisoners, it appears that 1 is of superior education; 8 are well educated; 39 can read only; 113 are imperfectly educated, that is can read and write imperfectly; while 55 are entirely uneducated.

With regard to the waste of judicial power on circuit, we find that on the whole number of cases only 90 were of a description not triable at sessions; the remaining 172 might and ought to have been disposed of by the justices; and, no doubt, would have been, but for the rule which compels the judges to clear the gaol. Even of the 90 assizes cases several, as for instance, post-office offences and burglaries should be triable at sessions, as they are not a bit more serious offences than many with which the justices have power to deal. We hold it to be a positive waste of judicial strength and time that these 172 prisoners should have been tried by the Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Justice Hannen, and there is an incongruity in a "red judge" trying a man for stealing two eggs which we cannot help thinking has a prejudicial effect on the minds of the bystanders. Bearing in mind that this is one out of eight circuits, the whole waste of power and money must be enormous, and we recommend the subject to our political economists as one worthy of their attention.

ARBITRATIONS.

It is much to be regretted that in the bills by which the Government seek to give effect to some of the recommendations of the Judicature Commissioners, no attempt is made to improve the system of arbitrations. Few portions of the report of the Commission were received with more general approval than that in which the evils of the present practice are pointed out. "In the courts of common law a jury has always been regarded as the constitutional tribunal for trying issues of fact; and the theory is that all such questions are fit to be tried in that way. It has, however, long been apparent, in the practice of the courts of common law, that there are several classes of cases litigated in those courts to which trial by jury is not adapted, and in which the parties are compelled, in many cases after they have incurred all the expense of a trial, to resort to private arbitration. Until the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854 the parties could not be compelled to go to arbitration, and the power given by that Act is limited to cases where the dispute relates wholly or in part to matters of mere account, or where the parties have themselves, before action, agreed in writing to refer the difference to arbitration. The system of arbitration which has thus been introduced, is attended with much inconvenience. The practice is to refer cases which cannot be conveniently tried in court either to a barrister or to an expert. A barrister can seldom give that continuous attention to the case which is essential to its being speedily and satisfactorily disposed of; and an expert, being unacquainted with the laws of evidence, and with the rules which govern legal proceedings, allows questions to be introduced which have nothing to do with the matter at issue. In neither case has the referee that authority over the practitioners and witnesses which is essential to the proper conduct of the proceedings. If the barrister or solicitor who is engaged in the suit, or even a witness, has some other engagement, an adjournment is almost a matter of course. The arbitrator makes his own charges, generally depending on the number and length of the meetings, and the professional fees are regulated accordingly. The result is great and unnecessary delay, and a vast increase of expense to the suitors. The arbitrator thus appointed is the sole judge of law and fact, and there is no appeal from his judgment, however erroneous his view of the law may be—unless, perhaps, when the error appears on the face of his award. Nor is there any remedy, whatever may be the miscarriage of the arbitrator, unless he fails to decide on all the matters referred to him, or exceeds his jurisdiction, or is guilty of some misconduct in the course of the case."

To an unprofessional reader this passage would seem to describe a state of things about as unsatisfactory as can well be imagined, and one calling for an immediate remedy. To a professional man it will be but too plain that the language of the commissioners points out only some out of the many faults of the existing system, and that, even as to these, it errs rather in the direction of under-statement than of over-statement.

The first, and by no means the least, evil at present prevalent is one which the commissioners were not called upon to notice, for it arises more from the faults of individuals than of the law: it is, that a multitude of cases are referred to arbitration which ought not to be referred at all. There are unquestionably some cases which a judge and jury could not try fairly. If a case involves only a mass of isolated details a jury can hardly do it justice. A claim, for instance, by a contractor against a railway company for works done on their line can scarcely be disposed of by a jury; and can best be settled by some one who can go and see the works, have them explained to him by competent persons, and bring a single mind to bear upon the innumerable details of the matter. But it is the fashion now-a-days to refer causes, not because a jury cannot do complete justice to them, but simply because they would take an unusual length of time, or give exceptional trouble to the judge or the jury. And such cases are referred for the most part in consequence of pressure applied by the judge upon the counsel engaged in the case, and frequently in spite of the well-founded objections of the parties themselves. Everyone familiar with the proceedings of common law courts knows well that if he has a case for trial which seems likely to occupy three or four days, and is anxious to have it tried out before a jury, whatever the nature of the case may be, he will have to encounter a determined effort on the part of the judge to force the case to arbitration, on no ground whatever but that it will be somewhat troublesome to himself and the jury to try it. This is, in our judgment, grossly wrong. If a suitor's case be such that the constitutional tribunal can do fair justice to it, he is entitled to have it tried by that tribunal, whether it gives trouble or not. And the fact that men cannot get their cases tried by the tribunals before which the law says they shall be tried, is, we believe, among the principal of the causes which prevent the business in the common law courts from growing in proportion to the growth of commerce in the country, and which drive suitors, whenever it is possible, to the Court of Chancery.

The second great evil connected with the present system is that, even where a cause is properly referred it is not referred at the proper time, but, in the words of the commissioners, "after the parties have incurred all the expense of a trial." Nineteen out of twenty cases referred to arbitration are referred in court, after all court fees, counsel's fees, attorneys' fees, and costs of witnesses have been paid; and, when all this has been done, the parties are obliged to begin over again, and bear the costs of another trial even more expensive than the trial they have already paid for, but have not had.

The third injustice connected with arbitrations is that from no fault of their own, but solely from the nature of the claim, and the clumsiness and want of adaptability of our tribunals, the suitors in particular cases have at their own expense to provide their own judges and their own courts. The State professes to keep up court-houses and pay the salaries of judges. Yet the parties to cases referred have to pay the arbitrators' fees and hire rooms for them to sit in.

Another evil is not at first sight so obvious as those we have mentioned, but it is a very real one. The commissioners point out that "the arbitrator makes his own charges, generally depending on the number and length of the meetings." But this is not the only unsatisfactory point connected with the arbitrator's charges. The arbitrator is only entitled to his fees when he has made his award, and can only secure payment of them by taking care not to deliver his award to either party till they are paid. If neither party chooses to take up the award, the arbitrator never gets paid at all. Any gentleman in the habit of acting as arbitrator is therefore obliged, in self-defence, to charge such fees as shall cover not only fair remuneration for his time and labour, but also insurance against loss of fees in the mode we have pointed out.

The next great evil of the existing state of things is that an arbitrator's decision upon every question, whether of law or fact, is final and without appeal. It is monstrous that because the defects of our ordinary tribunals compel parties to go before an arbitrator they should lose the right of having the questions of law between them decided by the highest tribunals. It is monstrous that every decision of a judge upon a point of law should be subject to appeal, and that a decision of one who is not a judge, and is presumably less learned and less experienced than a judge, should be without appeal.

There can be no doubt, however, that the chief source of dissatisfaction with the present system of references is the mode in which arbitrations are conducted. Upon this point the commissioners have certainly not exaggerated the state of the case. It is a general rule that arbitrations give way to everything. Frequent adjournments and long intervals between the meetings, entailing inevitably repetition of evidence again and again, lead to the two worst faults that can mar the administration of justice—unreasonable delay and unreasonable expense—faults occurring in arbitrations in a far more exaggerated form than in any other existing mode of trial.

For these evils the commissioners suggested a tolerably simple remedy. Their plan is as follows:—

"We think that there should be attached to the Supreme Court officers to be called official referees, and that a judge should have power, at any time after the writ of summons, and with or without pleading, and generally upon such terms as he may think fit, to order a cause, or any matter arising therein, to be tried by a referee; and that whenever a cause is to be tried by a referee such trial should be by one of these official referees, unless a judge otherwise orders. We think, however, that a judge should have power to order such trial to be by some person not an official referee of the court, but who on being so appointed should pro hac vice be deemed to be and should act as if he were an official referee. The judge should have power to direct where the trial shall take place, and the referee should be at liberty, subject to any directions which may from time to time be given by the judge, to adjourn the trial to any place which he may deem to be more convenient. The referee should, unless the judge otherwise direct, proceed with the trial in open court, de die in diem. . . . The referee should be at liberty by writing under his hand to reserve, or pending the reference to submit, any question for the decision of the Court, or to state any facts specially with power to the Court to draw inferences; and the verdict should in such case be entered as the Court may direct. In all other respects the decision of the referee should have the same effect as a verdict at Nisi Prius, subject to the power of the Court to require any explanation or reasons from the referee, and to remit the cause or any part thereof for reconsideration to the same or any other referee. The referee should, subject to the control of the Court, have full discretionary power over the whole, or any part of the costs of the proceedings before him."

The scheme of which the outline is thus drawn would substantially meet the wants of the case. Under it an arbitrator would be a public officer, paid, like other judges, by the public. He would sit in public and continuously. His decisions would be subject to a proper appeal. Uncertainty, delay and undue expense would thus be avoided. But, further, we have no doubt that publicity in arbitrations would check the improper referring of causes that might be otherwise tried. Judges would not be too anxious to announce publicly that inferior officers could try causes better than themselves.

Probably an unwillingness to create new officers with new salaries has deterred the Government from following the advice of the commissioners. But the evil is a very pressing one, far more so than unprofessional people, except those who have suffered as victims of the system, can at all appreciate. And if, as seems likely, the High Court of Justice Bill is to be postponed for a year, it is much to be hoped that some such provisions as those recommended may be inserted in it before next session.

VOLUNTARY SETTLEMENTS MADE WITHOUT POWER OF REVOCATION.

The rule is usually stated broadly, that the Court of Chancery can set aside a voluntary settlement, but will not alter it: and broadly, this is true. There are, however, some observations of the Master of the Rolls in Lister v. Hodgson, 15 W. R. 547, L. R. 4 Eq. 30, and Philipson v. Kerry, 11 W. R. 1034, 32 Beav. 628, which have been thought rather puzzling.

In Lister v. Hodgson his Lordship said:—

What I consider to be established by the case is this, that if a voluntary deed is incomplete, this Court will not compel the completion of the impugned instrument; nor, on the other hand, will the Court help a person who has made a gift by a voluntary deed and then repudiates it, and asks the Court to set it aside and give him back the money. The Court says it will have nothing to do with it: if you can bring your action at law, do so; but this Court will not interfere in any respect whatever. Then, supposing this to be a voluntary deed, it is admitted that it does not carry out the intentions of the petitioner [the donor]; but it is said that you may reform it. There is this distinction to be taken. If a man executes a voluntary deed in his lifetime declaring certain trusts, and happens to die, and it is afterwards proved, from the instructions or otherwise, that beyond all doubt the deed was not prepared in the exact manner which he intended, then the deed may be reformed, and those particular provisions necessary to carry his intention into effect may be introduced. But if the case be that he made a mistake, and you say to him, "You intended that there should be a trust in favour of A.," and he says, "I intended no such thing; I do not choose to give anything to A.," no amount of evidence, however conclusive, proving that he did so intend, will at all justify the Court in compelling him to introduce a clause into the deed which he does not choose to introduce now, although he might at the time have wished to have done so. It comes to this—that the Court will never interfere to enforce a contract between parties for the due execution of a voluntary deed.

In Philipson v. Kerry, his Lordship said :—

If this had been a transaction where stock had been sold for a valuable consideration, then, possibly, the instrument might have been reformed, and so modified and rectified on proof of the intentions of the parties, as to have carried those intentions into effect; but in a voluntary gift that is impossible. The instrument is either good or bad; it cannot be modified to suit former intentions, unless the donor consent to make a new and distinct instrument. [The donor in this case was dead.]

We think, however, that the inconsistency in these passages vanishes on examination, as we shall presently point out.

It may be laid down as a general principle that the Court refuses to meddle with voluntary settlements; and we understand this policy as based in part on grounds identical with those on which the Court refuses to decree an injunction or specific performance where its interference would be nugatory, or its mandates, if pronounced, could not be enforced. Moreover, the Court, in granting specific performance, is moved by the consideration that the plaintiff had given value for that to which it asks the Court to help him, a motive which of course is wanting where the basis of the case is a voluntary settlement.

Therefore, if the settlor afterwards changes his mind, the Court will not help him to undo what he has done. He has other remedies. Nor will it interfere on behalf of the donees. It may be clear that if the settlor's intention had been carried out, one of them would have got more than he has, but the Court will not order the settlor specifically to perform his intention. Lord Romilly's remarks in Lister v. Hodgson seem to indicate one exception to this rule of not going within the four corners of a voluntary settlement—viz., where, after the settlor's death, it appears that there was a tangible mistake in the conveyancing by which the settlor's intentions were embodied. Here the settlor's death has prevented his making any re-settlement, and we infer that in such a case Lord Romilly would, on clear proof that there had been a mistake in the embodying of the settlor's intentions, rectify the voluntary settlement. The language used in Philipson v. Kerry (sup.) may at first seem inconsistent with this view, but we conceive that the inconsistency disappears on consideration. In Philipson v. Kerry the Master of the Rolls was speaking of that description of impropriety (it does not necessarily amount to fraud) which the Court considers to have taken place where the settlor executed the settlement without being made fully and completely aware of the consequences; as, for instance, if he was not made fully aware of the consequences of his executing a deed without power of revocation. So far as anything of that kind is implicated, the deed is either good or bad; if tainted it is tainted throughout, and must be set aside. The Court will not amend it in favour of the settlor, but will set it aside in toto. This, however, is a different thing from a mere conveyancing mistake, which, as we understand the Master of the Rolls in Lister v. Hodgson, may be rectified after the settlor's death. The difference is that in one case the settlor knew what he was about, but his conveyancer did not follow him; in the other case the settlor did not know what he was doing.

With this qualification it is true, as the rule is broadly stated, that the Court will set aside, but will not reform, a voluntary settlement.

As to the grounds upon which voluntary settlements are avoided—Undue Influence, of course, is one principal ground. We discussed that subject two years ago,* apropos of the cause celebre of Lyon v. Home, and may now pass it by. It is a principle that a volunteer claiming under a settlement is saddled with the onus of proving that, to use the expression of Lord Eldon in Gilbert v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 296, "the transaction was righteous."

The donee must show that the donor knew and understood what he was doing; "but if besides the obtaining the benefit of this voluntary gift the donor and donee were so situated towards each other that undue influence might have been exercised by the donee over the donor, then a new consideration is added, and the question is, not whether the donor knew what he was doing, but how the intention was produced." Hoghton v. Hoghton, 15 Beav. 399, Huguenin v. Bailey, 14 Ves. 300. The above passage from Lord Romilly's judgment in Hoghton v. Hoghton puts neatly the difference between the cases we are writing about and those of undue influence.

The question whether or not the Court will set aside a voluntary settlement on the ground that the settlor did not understand what he was about, is, of course, as a question of fact, one upon which no definite hard and fast rules can be laid down; nor, if it were possible, would it be expedient that any such rules should be laid down. There is no test beyond that of common sense applied to each case as it arises.

In Hoghton v. Hoghton Lord Romilly observed that the mere reading over a deed to an unprofessional person would not be sufficient proof that he understood it, unless it were shown that the reading was accompanied by an explanation. There may be various circumstances which increase the presumption that the settlor could not have understood the act he was performing. As, for instance, if, as in Philipson v. Kerry, its effect was to deprive the settlor of all her property, and to render her entirely dependent on the bounty, and not merely the bounty but the forethought, of her own donee. It would require strong evidence to induce the Court to believe that a settlor had, with her eyes open, freely consented to so imprudent an act.

In Anderson v. Elsworth, 9 W. R. 888, Vice-Chancellor Stuart set aside a voluntary settlement made by an old woman, by which, without power of revocation reserved she parted with the whole of her property to a niece. The settlor had asked what was the difference between the effect of a will and a deed, and had been told that the former was revocable, and the latter not. The Vice-Chancellor set aside the settlement, on the ground that she had not been informed of this further difference, that the deed, unlike the will, divested her of her property immediately. In this case the donor lived with the donee till her death, and there seems to have been no evidence that she had ever desired to undo the settlement: it was urged, therefore, that, as the property had now passed to the person intended by the settlor to have it, there was no reason whatever why the Court should avoid it at the instance of the heir-at-law or a devisee under a previous will (as the case there was). Yet, although the Vice-Chancellor considered it clearly proved that the settlor intended this niece to have the property, he set the settlement aside. If this case is to be considered as deciding that a voluntary settlement must necessarily be set aside if the settlor did not comprehend all its consequences, even though the deviation from what she understood may never have come into operation, it would scarcely, we think, be now followed. We do not, for instance conceive that a settlement should be set aside for want of an understanding on the settlor's part, that it was irrevocable, if it can be proved that the settlor never as a fact desired to revoke it or to make any different disposition of the property. As the Master of the Rolls observed in Philipson v. Kerry, "it is a matter of importance and one which has great weight with the Court, whenever it appears that the donor has continued throughout her life cognizant of what she has done, and has evinced no regret for the act she has done, or expressed any desire to disturb it." The Court avoids a settlement, as we understand its principles, not because the settlor had an insufficient explanation, but because the settlement did not carry out her intentions; the want of coincidence with the intention is the cause which moves the Court, and the want of explanation is only a circumstance which in the events which happened gave rise to that cause. If, in the course of events, the act performed coincides with the act proposed, the ground for interference is sought in vain. Altogether, this case of Anderson v. Elsworth is not very reliable, as the decision may have proceeded on the Vice-Chancellor's general belief in the settlor's weakness of understanding.

Subject to the foregoing remarks, the absence of a power of revocation is another circumstance affording a presumption that the results of the settlement made were not fully comprehended by the settlor. Upon this point turned the two recent cases of Coutts v. Acworth, 18 W. R. 482, L. R. 8 Eq. 558, decided by Vice-Chancellor Malins, and Wollaston v. Tribe, 18 W. R. 83, L. R. 9 Eq. 44. And here we must repeat that it is scarcely correct to say, as we have heard it said, that the absence of a power of revocation is necessarily fatal to a voluntary settlement. There is no magic in the thing. The matter is simply that the absence of a power of revocation raises a very strong presumption that the settlor was not furnished with proper explanations. As Lord Justice Turner observed in Toker v. Toker (3 D. G. J. & S. 491), "it would be a most unwarrantable interference with the rights of property to hold that no voluntary settlement could be valid unless a power of revocation was inserted in it. . . . Again, I think it going too far to say that no voluntary settlement can be valid unless the settlor is advised that there should be a power of revocation inserted in it. What the Court has to be satisfied of in these cases is that the settlement, whether containing or not containing a power of revocation, is the free determined act of the party making it; and the absence of advice as to the insertion of a power of revocation is a circumstance, and a circumstance merely, to be weighed in connection with the other circumstances of the case."

In Coutts v. Acworth, Vice-Chancellor Malins expatiated considerably upon the duty of solicitors of "insisting that there should be, and almost going to the extent of refusing to execute such an instrument unless there be, a power of altering that which was done." In another passage the Vice-Chancellor stated that the cases of Anderson v. Elsworth (sup.) and Forshaw v. Welsby, 31 Beav. 629, "show that where the circumstances are such that the donor under the deed ought to be advised to retain a power of revocation, and a power of revocation is not inserted, it is fatal to the deed." Vice-Chancellor Malins did substantial justice in Coutts v. Acworth, and in nine cases out of ten the result of following his phraseology in that case would be the proper result; but the obiter dicta in question go beyond the mark and exceedingly likely to mislead. They are an instance of the inexpediency of attempting to prescribe rigid rules where in the nature of the case there can be none.

Though, however, there is no magic in powers of revocation, it is, it need hardly be said, highly advisable that solicitors in acting for voluntary settlers should urge their clients to retain power of revocation, and point out the consequences of their not doing so. And we may mention that in Forshaw v. Welsby (sup.) the solicitor being also a trustee of the settlement, and therefore a party to the suit, was denied his costs, merely for dereliction of this duty.

THE LAW OF DIVORCE IN FRANCE.

A case has been recently brought before the First Chamber of the Imperial Court of Paris, in which interesting and curious questions were raised concerning divorce and separation à mensâ et thoro, when decreed by a foreign Court. In this case the husband and wife had been placed in a most curious predicament by the judgment of the foreign Court; the marriage had been dissolved as against one, and had been maintained as to the vinculum against the other. The facts were the following:—A M. Fay, a denizen of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, married in Paris a Frenchwoman named Caroline Grebert. Their union was not happy, and difficulties arose between them, which resulted in mutual actions for divorce in the Frankfort Court, which city, being the domicile of the husband, had by the marriage become that of the wife. In due course the Court pronounced in the two suits a judgment, a part of which is curious enough to be given at length:—

"On the appeal of M. Jules Fay, burgher and trader in this town, defendant and likewise plaintiff, against his wife, Caroline Grebert, plaintiff and defendant likewise, a decree has been made as follows. . . .

"Whereas, not only has the complaint brought by her appeared without foundation, but the acts of the said defendant, brought up by her husband against her, in support of his demand, have been proved in every point. The following judgment has been respectively given between the parties:—

"1. The plaintiff is ousted of her demand and condemned to keep quiet.

"2. The plaintiff, defendant in the counter-action, is declared a malicious and a calumnious woman, and as to her the separation quoad thorum et mensam is decreed between the parties during their lives; and as to the husband, plaintiff in the counter-action, the marriage is declared dissolved between the parties quoad vinculum."

The cause of this arrangement of the judgment lies in the difference of the religion of the parties and in the law of Frankfort. That law follows, in this respect, the religion of the parties; and, in consequence, the judgment delivers the husband, who is a Protestant, from the marriage ties; whereas the wife, who by the tenets of her faith—the Catholic religion—is bound to consider marriage as an indelible sacrament, is to remain fettered thereby, in this marriage without a husband, a strange example of a woman who is neither a maid, widow, nor wife.

In consequence of the separation effected by this judgment the parties wished to liquidate the community of goods which had existed between them, and for that purpose applied to the Civil Tribunal of the Seine. That tribunal, however, in conformity with the opinion of the Procureur Imperial, declined to entertain jurisdiction in the matter, by reason of both parties being aliens, the husband by birth and the wife by the marriage. The parties therefore attempted to settle their affairs amicably, and the husband gave his wife a power of attorney; but new disagreements arising, the husband withdrew his power, whereupon the wife cited him before the Civil Tribunal of the Seine, contending that the effect of the judgment of the Court of Frankfort, which had decreed a divorce in favour of her husband being to reinstate her in her original French nationality, she should be held free to receive and administer her own property without the interference or consent of her husband. The husband, M. Fay, demurred to the jurisdiction of the Court on the ground of both parties being aliens. The Court—notwithstanding this plea and the judgment by which, seemingly, the principle upon which it was grounded had been already admitted—held this time, on a point not before raised, that it had jurisdiction over the cause. The new point was—the effect to be given to the divorce decreed in favour of the husband by the Court of Frankfort. The Civil Tribunal now held in substance that the wife had been deprived of her French nationality, only by the effect of the marriage; that that marriage had been dissolved by the judgment of Frankfort-on-the-Maine; that, though the tenets of her religion prohibited her from taking advantage of such divorce in respect of a second marriage, she could not be debarred from taking advantage of the logical and necessary consequences of the divorce; that the vinculum of marriage is indivisible, and that it cannot be loosed from one of the parties without the other at the same time being set free; and that, therefore, the circumstance which had conferred upon the wife the nationality of her husband having been set aside, she should be held to have recovered her original French nationality:—on these grounds the Court assumed jurisdiction over the cause.

Against this decision M. Fay appealed. The case turning on a question of status, was, as required by the law, brought on to what is called a solemn hearing (audience solennelle), that is, before two chambers of the Imperial Court sitting together for the occasion, of which the first chamber, presided over by the first President, is invariably one.

The judgment of the Court below was quashed. M. Fay gained his cause. The Imperial Court held that the principles of the French law had nothing to do with the case; that Mme. Fay, having married a citizen of Frankfort had become by the operation of the marriage a subject of that city and amenable to its laws; that those laws, not being contrary to public morals or order, should govern the case, however strange their operation according to French ideas; and therefore that,—since according to those laws a competent Court had declared the marriage to be still binding on the wife, though the husband had been released therefrom, that decision should be carried out and the wife should be held not to have recovered her original French nationality, and to be still liable to all the disabilities arising by the law of Frankfort from her coverture.

Notwithstanding the abolition of divorce in France, the Imperial Courts would no doubt have followed the law of the national domicile of the husband, even had the wife belonged to a religion which allowed of the marriage being broken, and had the judges of Frankfort absolved her therefrom accordingly. She would not, however, have recovered her French nationality, ipso facto, by the mere operation of the divorce. By article 19 of the Code Napoléon, a Frenchwoman who has married an alien may recover her French nationality after the death of her husband. But she must make a formal declaration that her intention is to establish her domicile in France; and, where the marriage has been dissolved when she was out of France, obtain the consent of the Government of that country to her return there. This article, it is to be observed, expressly provides only for the dissolution of the marriage by the death of the husband; it speaks only of the widow, but it has been generally held to apply likewise to the severance of the tie by the operation of a divorce. A foreign divorce decreed between an alien husband and his wife, whether she were alien originally, or has become such by the marriage, the French courts will recognise. They will even go so far as to sanction a marriage solemnised in France between parties who have been divorced by the competent courts in other countries. This, however, owing to the particular character of the motive which excluded divorce from the Code Napoléon, has met with some dissentient voices. Originally it formed a part of the Code. The legislators who framed the Code were most of them fostered under the auspices of the philosophers of the Encyclopédie, and were decidedly not fettered by Catholic scruples. They had in their original plan provided for conjugal infelicity no remedy other than divorce. At the solicitation, however, of some who took into consideration the scruples and feelings of those who still were attached to the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church, in which marriage, being considered as a sacrament, is held to be indissoluble, the separation a mensâ et thoro was introduced into the Code. At the Restoration of the Bourbons the Catholic religion got into the ascendant, and divorce was expunged from the Code Napoleon, as a flagrant outrage on the principles of the Church of the State, and never to be reinstated there. Many theorists have since contended that the French Courts should not in their judgments at all recognise the validity of a divorce, whether of French subject or alien,—however legal in the country in which it has been decreed, and however competent the Court,—any more than they recognise polygamy, however consistent it may be with the laws of the domicile of the party. The French Courts, however, have not given their assent to that extreme doctrine; and where the subjects of a country in which divorce is lawful have been divorced by the competent authority, they have been held in France to be free to marry again. This does not, however, apply to French subjects who get naturalised in a foreign country in order to procure a divorce. That is treated as a fraudulent evasion of the law of France. Under what circumstances (if any) a naturalisation followed by a divorce would be bonâ fide, remains yet to be decided.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

EXECUTION AGAINST SHAREHOLDERS.

Healey v. Chichester and Midhurst Railway Company, M.R., 18 W. R. 270, L. R. 9 Eq. 148.

The Companies Clauses Act (8 Vict. c. 16) s. 36, enables creditors of a joint-stock company, "if there cannot be found sufficient whereon to levy execution," to issue execution by leave of the Court against any of the shareholders, to the extent of their shares not then paid up. The meaning is, that if the property of the company be not sufficient to satisfy the debt, a creditor may obtain leave to issue execution against the shareholders. The section does not imply that execution must first have been levied against the company; but, if it appear to the satisfaction of the Court that the property of the company is not sufficient to satisfy the debt, the Court will, in the exercise of its discretion, give leave to issue a sci. fa. against any of the shareholders, provided execution against the company shall have actually issued, though it need not have been levied: Ulfcombe Railway Company v. Lord Poltimore, 16 W. R. 460, L. R. 3 C. P. 288; and it is no answer to a declaration on the sci. fa. against a shareholder that he has transferred his shares after the motion for leave to issue the writ, and before the writ has issued: Nixon v. Green, 4 W. R. 209, 11 Ex. 550; so that, in fact, every person is liable to be thus proceeded against who is a shareholder at the time of the motion, which the statute requires shall be made in open court, and after sufficient notice to the persons sought to be charged.

There are, therefore, two stages in the procedure at common law and on this section, the first being the motion required by the Act, the second the action commenced by the writ of sci. fa.: Hitchins v. Kilkenny Railway Company, 10 C. B. 160. This course is likely to cause delay, as it gives the shareholder in effect two opportunities of questioning the validity of the order. In Healey v. Chichester and Midhurst Railway Company the Master of the Rolls did not direct a writ of sci. fa. to issue, which seems to be the invariable practice at common law, but ordered execution to issue against the shareholders, unless cause were shown on or before a given day; it apparently being his opinion that the Court is not bound to issue a writ of sci. fa. in such cases. The words of the statute are simply "execution may be issued." The words "sci. fa." do not occur. All that is necessary is, that the shareholder should have an opportunity of questioning the validity of the order.

DEBTOR'S RIGHT ON EXTINCTION OF THE DEBT TO POLICY EFFECTED BY WAY OF SECURITY.

The circumstances under which the grantor of an annuity is entitled on redemption to have a policy of assurance effected on his life by the grantee delivered up, were considered in this case. In Gottlieb v. Cranch (4 D. M. G. 440), where the policy had been effected by the grantee pursuant to a stipulation binding the grantor to enable the policy to be effected, but not binding the grantee to effect the policy, the Court of Appeal held that upon the repurchase of the annuity the policy belonged to the grantee. The transaction in the present case was a similar one, and the Vice-Chancellor considered that he was bound by the decision in Gottlieb v. Cranch to dismiss the grantee's bill to have the policy delivered to him on redemption of the annuity.

In Courtenay v. Wright (9 W. R. 153, 2 Giff. 337), as in the present case, the Vice-Chancellor disapproved of Gottlieb v. Cranch. His Honour denied the existence of any general rule that, where the grantee of an annuity assures the life of the grantor, the policy is deliverable to the grantor on redemption. In Drysdale v. Pigott (4 W. R. 773, 8 D. M. G. 546), a subsequent decision of the Court of Appeal to that in Gottlieb v. Cranch, where the creditor had effected an insurance on his debtor's life in his own name, and paid all the premiums except the first out of his own monies, and the debtor was not bound by any legal obligation to pay the premiums, the Lords Justices held that the debtor on redemption became entitled to the policy, on the ground that payment of premiums by the creditor was optional, and the substantial purpose of the assurance was to secure the debt; reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls, who had held (4 W. R. 518) that the debtor by refusing to pay premiums subsequent to the first, had abandoned and lost any right to the policy which he might otherwise have had.

It was decided in Courtenay v. Wright that where the relation of debtor and creditor exists, and a policy is effected by the creditor, directly or indirectly, at the expense of the debtor, under circumstances which show that it was intended as a security or indemnity to the creditor, he is bound, on payment of the debt, to deliver up the policy to the debtor. This we take to be the true principle. The transaction in Know v. Turner was in fact a loan at interest. It is observable that the annuity did in fact extend to cover the premiums on the policy which the creditor might or might not effect at his option according to the agreement with the debtor.

When once effected, the policy could only be regarded in the light of an indemnity to the creditor, and on redemption, the debtor's equity to have the policy delivered over to him could, but for Gottlieb v. Cranch, scarcely have been denied. Qui sentit onus, sentire debet et commodum is the maxim that applies to these cases, and where the debtor, by paying more than he would otherwise be compelled to pay in the shape of yearly payments to his creditor, provides a fund for paying the premiums on a policy effected by the creditor on his (the debtor's) life, it is only just that on redemption the debtor should have the benefit of the security. There must be privity between the parties, of course, but the Court will draw its own conclusions in the absence of any direct stipulation as to a policy being effected. In Lea v. Hinton (5 D. M. G. 823) the creditor had insured his debtor's life voluntarily, but, it appearing that he had done so by way of indemnity, and had charged the debtor in his accounts with the premiums paid, the Court gave the policy to the debtor on the debt being paid. Where there is an agreement, express or implied, that the creditor shall insure at the debtor's expense, the debtor, on paying the debt, is entitled to the policy (Morland v. Isaac, 3 W. R. 397, 5 D. M. G. 823); and, even in the absence of any such express or implied agreement, we submit that the debtor who satisfies the claim of his creditor is entitled to have handed over to him any policy effected on his life by the creditor, if effected by way of indemnity to the creditor, the premiums on which the debtor has either directly or indirectly, as in Know v. Turner, been compelled to pay. It is no more than an application of the general rule that a debtor on paying his debt is entitled to have every security for the debt handed over to him.

ALTERATION OF WINDOW LIGHTS.

Staigt v. Burn, L. J. G., 18 W. R. 24, 3 L. R. Sch. 163.

It was decided in the leading case of Tapling v. Jones, 13 W. R. 617, 11 H. L. 290, that an alteration of an ancient light does not prevent the owner from recovering damages at law for an obstruction. If a house possessing ancient lights be pulled down and rebuilt, the owner is still entitled to recover damages for an interference with such light as his ancient windows enjoyed; and if the position of the windows be such that his neighbour cannot obstruct the new light without also obstructing the light which he possesses as of right in virtue of the ancient windows, the effect will be to protect the whole of the light, and acquire in time an easement which may exceed in any conceivable degree the easement to which the owner was originally entitled. Such is the rule at law; but in equity, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley seems to have considered that a case of this nature was not one where the Court ought to interfere by injunction, where the effect would be to enable a person to avail himself of the right he had to impose on his neighbour a servitude far larger than previously existed: Curriers Company v. Corbett, 13 W. R. 1056, 2 Dr. & Sm. 355. This case, however, was decided before the decision on appeal in Tapling v. Jones. The same view appears to have been taken by the Master of the Rolls in Heath v. Bucknall, 17 W. R. 755, L. R. 8 Eq. 1. But as a judicial decision Heath v. Bucknall, as we gather from the remarks of the Lord Justice in Staigt v. Burn, amounts to no more than this, that where a very small and almost inappreciable part of the ancient window is preserved, and the rest is new, so that the servitude is in fact a completely new servitude, the Court will not interfere by injunction. Whether the Court ought not in such a case to assess the damages, possibly at a nominal sum, instead of dismissing the bill and leaving the plaintiff to his remedy at law, as was done in Heath v. Bucknall, we do not presume to say. But where there is a clear legal right, and material injury to that legal right is established, as in Staigt v. Burn, the Court will interfere by injunction without considering how far the result will be to protect the new lights which have been opened under cover of the ancient lights.

AGREEMENT TO SELL AT A PRICE TO BE FIXED BY A THIRD PERSON.

Weekes v. Gallard, M. R., 18 W. R. 331.

Where A. agrees to sell, and B. to purchase an estate at a price to be fixed by C., and C. accordingly names the sum to be paid for the estate, equity will compel specific performance of the contract. However inadequate the price fixed may be, the parties have made C. their judge upon the point; the chances are perfectly equal, and his decision must be treated as final, nor will the Court in general inquire what is the true value in such a case, where the price to be fixed is of the essence of the contract of sale (Gourlay v. Duke of Somerset, 19 Ves 431). Lord Alvanley's dictum in Emery v. Ware (5 Ves. 846), that an agreement to sell according to the valuation of a third person is not such as the Court would be desirous to enforce, can have little weight at the present day. It is of course essential that the referee should have acted fairly and carefully; but his competence can hardly be questioned after the parties have, by nominating him, admitted him to be competent. Fraud or mistake, which vitiate every award, may be inferred from gross inadequacy of price; yet in a case where the price fixed was more than double the valuation by the purchaser's own witnesses, the Court declined to infer that the referee had mistaken (Collier v. Mason, 25 Beav. 200). In Weekes v. Gallard there was some inadequacy of value, but the Court, as might be expected, did not listen to the argument of hardship or infer mistake as to the capabilities of the property. The arbitrator may not delegate his office (Hopcroft v. Hickman, 2 S. & S. 130), though he may make use of the judgment of another (Emery v. Ware, ubi sup.). But these remarks apply rather to the duties of arbitrators in general.

Parker v. Whitby, Turn. & Russ. 366, is a case which appears not easy to reconcile with the law as generally laid down. It is singular that the case should not be noticed in Lord St. Leonards' Vendors and Purchasers. In that case Sir Thomas Plumer refused to decree specific performance of an agreement to sell at a price to be fixed by two persons to be subsequently named (not as erroneously stated in the head-note, by two persons who were named), on the ground that the price then fixed was considerably below the value of the property. We do not see that the fact of the persons being named subsequently to, instead of by, the agreement affects the question. Sir Thomas Plumer was of opinion upon the evidence that the land was worth more than the price which had been fixed; and he added, "I cannot accede to the position, that, because the parties by their contract referred the ascertaining of the value to two individuals, the Court is bound by the judgment of those individuals, and cannot have recourse to other means in order to satisfy its own conscience." No doubt the intention of the parties was that the land should be sold for a fair price, but was it not of the essence of the contract that the price should be fixed by the parties who were nominated in order to, and who actually did, fix it?

RULE AS TO THE APPOINTMENT OF AN OFFICIAL LIQUIDATOR.

Re Northern Assam Tea Company, Ex parte Galsworthy, L.C. & L.J.G., 18 W. R. 362.

This is quite a matter for the discretion of the judge. The misfortune is that any attempt to lay down a rule with a view of stopping the discreditable contests which often occur in these cases, has the effect of interfering with the exercise of the discretion of the judge. Malins, V.C., laid down on one occasion that the person nominated by the parties having the carriage of the winding-up order was to be the liquidator, if a fit and proper person (Re General Provident Insurance Company, 17 W. R. 42). The Master of the Rolls, on the other hand, has given the preference to a person nominated by the shareholders, on the ground that they, rather than the creditors, have an interest in winding up economically, so as to secure some returns on their shares. The rule now laid down that, in making the appointment, the judge is to exercise his discretion, having regard to the wishes of creditors and contributories, as far as possible, will have a salutary effect, especially if the rule as to costs be adhered to, that only the person whose proposal is accepted is to have his costs, and those only as between party and party. But how is a judge to act when, as is often the case, A. is nominated by the creditors and B. by the shareholders, and both are equally fit and proper for the office?

COMMON LAW.

STAMPS—LEASE—"FURTHER OR OTHER VALUABLE CONSIDERATION"—17 & 18 VICT. C. 83, s. 16.

Boulton v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Ex. 18 W. R. 351.

Considerable surprise was felt at the decision of this case, which in fact alters in one important particular the practice of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in stamping leases.

17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 16 enacts that "where any deed or instrument which shall be chargeable with any ad valorem stamp duty in respect of any sum of money yearly or in gross. . . therein mentioned shall be made also for any further or other valuable consideration," such deed shall be chargeable with a further stamp duty. Boulton's case decides that a covenant in a lease by the lessee to complete houses already partially built upon the demised land is a "further or other valuable consideration," and, therefore, renders the lease subject to a further stamp duty in addition to the ad valorem stamp fixed by the amount of the rent. The words of the Act in their ordinary meaning seem to include a case like this, but the practice has hitherto been not to require the additional stamp in these cases.

There has been a good deal of comment upon this decision, and some correspondence about it has already appeared in our columns, and we therefore now only notice the point actually decided, which depended upon the construction of the statute. We believe a bill (see ante 371) has already been introduced into the House of Commons for the purpose of granting an indemnity, when deeds falling within the principle of Boulton's case, but stamped before that decision, have not the additional stamp now decided to be necessary.

RIGHT OF ACTION—INJURY TO PLAINTIFF'S TRADE BY PREVENTING CUSTOMERS FROM COMING TO HIM.

Higgins v. O'Donnell, 18 W. R. Q. B. (Ir.) 378.

The precise point decided in this case is not of much importance, as it arose upon demurrer to a declaration of a very unusual form. The judgment however (which was the unanimous judgment of the Queen's Bench of Ireland after they had taken time to consider) formally approves some of the principles laid down in Lumley v. Gye (1 W. R. 432), which have at different times given rise to much discussion. It is chiefly on this account that we notice Higgins v. O'Donnell.

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff was possessed of certain stores where he was accustomed to buy and sell corn, as the defendant knew, and that the defendant, intending to injure the plaintiff in his business, demanded certain tolls, not of right payable to the defendant, of certain customers of the plaintiff who were then carrying corn to the plaintiff to sell to him, and the defendant detained the carts of the customers carrying the corn on non-payment of the tolls, and thereby caused damage to the plaintiff. There was a demurrer to this declaration, and, as might have been expected, the demurrer was allowed as the declaration did not allege any injury to any property of the plaintiff nor the violation of any right in the plaintiff; as it was not stated that the plaintiff had any franchise such as a market, &c., or that the customers who were detained were under any contract to bring their corn to the plaintiff or to sell it to him.

Lumley v. Gye was cited in the course of the argument, and was commented upon in the judgment. This case was an action by the manager of a theatre against the defendant for inducing Joanna Wagner, who had contracted with the plaintiff to perform at his theatre, to break her contract. It was held on demurrer to the declaration that the action lay. It was sufficient for the actual decision to hold that the case fell within the principle of the Statutes of Labourers (23 Ed. 3. and 25 Ed. 3), which contain many provisions respecting the hiring, employment, &c., of labourers and other servants.

Three out of the four judges who decided Lumley v. Gye, viz., Crompton, Erle and Wightman, JJ., Coleridge, J., dissenting, expressed a strong opinion that the declaration might be supported upon a principle much broader and of more universal application than that which depends upon the Statutes of Labourers. This principle is that a person who maliciously induces one of two contracting parties to break his contract, and thereby causes damage to the other party to the contract, is guilty of an actionable wrong, and may be sued by the party thus damaged in an action on the case. It would seem that malice in the defendant and actual damage to the plaintiff would be necessary to constitute such a cause of action. This principle is one which is almost entirely new to English law, has hardly any direct authority to support it, and was not necessary for the decision of Lumley v. Gye. It has, however, the authority of the opinions of three learned judges, contained in carefully considered written judgments. It has, therefore, in effect, all the weight of an actual decision on the point.

The peculiarity of this principle is that a person may be sued for damage caused by the breach of a contract to which he is not a party. The question can hardly arise in the case of wrongs wholly independent of contract, because one who induces another to commit a tort is liable as a principal wrongdoer. If A. induce B. to trespass on the land of X., A. is liable to an action for the trespass in precisely the same manner as if he had in person gone with B. on to X.'s land. In contemplation of law, A. and B. are joint trespassers. If, however, A. induces B. to break a contract made between B. and X., the position of the parties necessarily differs much from the case first put. A. and B. were under the same duty to abstain from the trespass for which they both became liable when committed, but A. and B. are not under the same duty with respect to the contract. The mere breach of contract cannot in any case affect A., as he is no party to it. Even if he causes the breach he cannot be sued upon the contract, either alone or jointly with B. The principle we are discussing, therefore, is not supported by any satisfactory analogy to be drawn from the law of torts, is quite without analogy in the law of contracts, and has, as we have said, hardly any direct authority in its favour.

In thus pointing out the peculiarity and novelty of the principle laid down in Lumley v. Gye, we do not wish to express any disapprobation of that principle. On the contrary, if it is carefully restricted to cases where there is malice in the defendant and actual damage caused to the plaintiff, the right of action would, we think, be useful, although probably such actions would never become very frequent. It is however desirable, before a new right of action is finally established, that its analogy to other causes of action and its probable results should be carefully and maturely considered. It is for this reason that we have noticed the case of Lumley v. Gye, with which must now be cited on this point the judgment in Higgins v. O'Donnell, where the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, commenting on Lumley v. Gye, and on the dissenting judgment of Coleridge, J., expresses a preference for the "more enlarged and just principles asserted in the judgments of the majority of the Court."

CRIMINAL LAW.

Reg. v. Stainer, C.C.R., 18 W. R. 439.

The actual point decided in this case is that a friendly society, some of whose rules are in restraint of trade, may nevertheless indict an officer of the society who has embezzled the society's money. The principle of the decision is that such a friendly society is not an illegal society in the sense of being criminal. Its members cannot be indicted for a conspiracy, although it may in some respects be illegal so far as its civil rights are concerned. The decision in Reg. v. Stainer does not touch the question how far an association of this kind would be affected in civil proceedings by the fact that some of its rules are in restraint of trade.

The judgment in this case was based to a great extent upon the principle recognised in 31 & 32 Vict. c. 61, the "Trades Unions Funds Protection Act," but it does not overrule any former cases on this point. The three best known of these cases are Hilton v. Eckersly (4 W. R. 326), Hornby v. Close (15 W. R. 336), and Farrer v. Close (17 W. R. 1729). In each of these questions respecting the effect of contracts in restraint of trade were discussed, but the point raised in Reg. v. Stainer was not decided. It appears, however, that the dictum of Crompton, J., in Hilton v. Eckersly in the Court of Queen's Bench (24 L. J. Q. B. at p. 356) that combinations like that in Hilton v. Eckersly are "illegal, and indictable at common law," must be now considered as overruled by Reg. v. Stainer. It may be as well also to notice that in Reg. v. Stainer the general object of the society and of its rules was, in the words of Cockburn, C.J., "primâ facie, lawful and beneficial," although there were two or three rules in restraint of trade. It does not follow from Reg. v. Stainer that no combinations in restraint of trade can be indictable, but only that such combinations as there existed were not indictable. Cockburn, C.J., says, "In my opinion the main objects of the society must be criminal" in order to raise the question whether the society is disentitled to the protection of the criminal law.

EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY OF DEPOSITION OF DECEASED WITNESS—SIGNATURE BY JUSTICE.

The Queen v. Parker, 18 W. R. 353.

By section 17 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, a deposition made before justices on the committal of a person for trial is made evidence at the trial if the witness who made it is then dead, and if the deposition "purports to be signed by the parties by or before whom the same purports to have been taken," and there is a reference in the section to a schedule which gives a form for the depositions.

It is not quite clear on the wording of the section whether, when there are several depositions, the justices should sign each deposition, or whether it is enough that they sign once for all at the end of all the depositions. The form given in the schedule clearly requires one signature only for any number of depositions.

In Reg. v. Parker a number of depositions were signed once only at the end by the justices in the form given in the schedule, and it was held that this was a sufficient signature to make one of the depositions—which was not the last one nor on the same sheet as the signatures of the justices—admissible evidence on the death of the witness who made it. There could hardly have been any doubt on the point except for a case of Reg. v. Richards (4 F. & F. 860), where Cockburn, C.J., expressed a contrary opinion. However, in Reg. v. Parker, he explained that when he ruled in Reg. v. Richards that each deposition must be signed he had not had his attention drawn to the form of the schedule, and that he now thought that Reg. v. Richards was wrong.

Reg. v. Parker is of very little importance except for the purpose of settling the doubt caused by Reg. v. Richards. But for that case the point was not only clear in itself, but there was also authority for holding the law to be as Reg. v. Parker now conclusively decides it to be.

REVIEWS.

The History of the Law of Tenures of Land in England and Ireland. By W. F. FINLASON, Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens & Haynes. 1870.

Mr. Finlason's little volume has already been referred to in the House of Commons with approval by no less a personage than the Premier himself. The praise was not undeserved. To those who know nothing of the mysterious "Irish land question" Mr. Finlason tells much in an agreeable and readable manner. To those who bring to the study of his book some knowledge he will furnish many new ideas, and much additional information.

Mr. Finlason prefaces his chapter upon Irish Tenancy (c. 4, pp. 84-152) with an elaborate dissertation upon English tenures. The conclusion he arrives at is that our common law favours inheritable tenancy. Indeed, he goes so far as to say that before statutes had been passed to render illegal the creation of perpetual tenancies, and to require that leases for any term over a prescribed number of years should be accompanied with certain formalities, the normal characteristic of agricultural leases in England was that they were inheritable. The value of this proposition to elucidate the present controversy is not very clear to us. But the fact that before the Statute of Quia Emptores (18 Edw. 1) the creation of an inheritable tenancy in fee was possible to the lord of an English estate may perhaps calm the apprehensions of timid legislators. It may be that in this Land Bill, as in so many other reform bills, we are but feeling our way back to a state of perfection which we once enjoyed. It is certain that until now every legislative enactment from Quia Emptores downwards has tended to confirm the purely contractual relation of landlord and tenant in England; and to this extent the bill now before Parliament does reverse modern and revert to old ideas, that it ceases to treat the landlord and tenant as persons capable of contract. The tenant's "status" is assumed to be such that he cannot contract upon fair terms. In Ireland the law of progress so eloquently enlarged upon in Mr. Maine's "Ancient Law" is to be reversed. Everywhere else, even in reactionary Russia, society is moving from status to contract; but there it is henceforth to move from contract back again to status. The necessity for such legislation seems imperative; but the existence of the necessity is not a subject for congratulation. The feudal system and that law of "inheritable tenure," the details of which occupy more than half Mr. Finlason's treatise, were no doubt suited to an age where more than one-half of the population of Europe were serfs. But however necessary the revival of a somewhat similar code may be in Ireland, we have no desire to see it declared by Parliament that in England as well as in Ireland tenants are incapable of contract.

Mr. Finlason's chapter on tenure in Ireland itself gives a useful resumé of the previous efforts of the Legislature to deal satisfactorily with the land there. None have, in his opinion, been satisfactory because all have been based upon the fundamental mistake of supposing that an Irish tenant can meet his landlord upon equal terms. The present measure proceeds upon the reverse assumption, and we presume has met substantially with the author's approval. He must have felt, when it was introduced, a good deal of the satisfaction of a successful prophet. He advocates strongly compulsory legislation, retrospective compensation, equitable arbitration, and a statutory definition of tenure, and in Mr. Gladstone's bill he has found all these points more or less fully embodied. He has evidently read much upon the difficult subject he has written upon, and we are glad to be able to recommend the result of his investigations to our readers. We may add that the notes with which he has enriched the text are frequently exceedingly interesting.

COURTS.

WEST INDIAN INCUMBERED ESTATES COURT. Westminster.

(Before Mr. FLEMING, Q.C., and Mr. CUST, Commissioners.)

Jan. 14, Feb. 25.—Re Edwards; Ex parte Parker & Co.—The Comfort Hall Estate.

Priority—Consignee and manager—Liberty to appeal.

The manager of a West Indian Estate who advances his own moneys for the cultivation of the estate cannot in the absence of special circumstances claim a lien on the estate in respect of such advances as against the consignee.

Liberty to appeal to the Privy Council will not be granted unless the amount at stake is sufficient to justify the expense.

In this case the Comfort Hall Estate in the Island of Antigua, containing 538 acres, had been sold under an order of the Commissioners for £300, which was insufficient to discharge the incumbrances on the estate, and divers questions arose in consequence on the settlement of the schedule of incumbrances, as to the priority of the several incumbrancers.

The estate had been for many years in the possession of Ann Wickham Edwards, who died in 1867. In 1853 Henry Bourne was appointed agricultural attorney or manager, and acted in that capacity until the year 1865, when he gave up the management voluntarily.

In January or February, 1863, Messrs. McDonald became consignees of the estate, and made the necessary advances in that capacity until December, 1866, at which time a considerable balance was due to them, which balance had become vested by assignment in Messrs. Parker & Co., the petitioners. The fund in Court was not sufficient to pay the whole of this balance.

Bourne, the late manager, alleged that at the time when he gave up the management the sum of £249 16s. 5d. was due to him in respect of advances made by him for the benefit of the estate, and he claimed to be placed on the schedule in respect of this sum in priority to the claim of the consignees. The consignees resisted this claim on the ground that Bourne was only a servant of the owner, and was not bound by contract or custom to expend his own moneys in the cultivation of the estate, and that if he did so he did so for the accommodation of the owner, and did not acquire any lien on the estate as against the consignees.

Archibald Smith, for Messrs. Parker & Co., the consignees.

Tremlett, for Bourne the manager, contended that a manager stood in as favourable position as a consignee, and ought to be paid, if not in priority to the consignee, at least pari passu. He cited Fraser v. Burgess, 13 Moore P. C. 314; Scott v. Smith, 3 Burge's Colonial Law 357; Chambers v. Davidson, L. R. 1 P. C. 296.

Mr. FLEMING, Q.C. (Chief Commissioner).—This matter comes before us on objections to the draft schedule of the purchase-money arising from the sale of the Comfort Hall estate. The estate sold for £800. The commission payable to the Treasury amounts to £16. The costs are high, owing to the long and heavy litigation in this court, and I am informed that they will exceed £230. The balance due to the receiver under this court is £271 7s. 4d., and the sum due to the consignees on their account since the objector gave up the management of the estate, is £76 10s. 1d., and if these amounts prove correct, the sum in respect of which the present contention arises can barely exceed £150. The objector acted as manager of the estate from the year 1853, and appears to have carried on the cultivation, without the assistance of a consignee, until the month of January or February, 1863. At that time he informed Mrs. Edwards, with whom he dealt as the owner of the property, that he required advances from a consignee to enable him to continue the cultivation, and, with her permission, he applied to a member of the firm of Messrs. McDonald, West Indian merchants, who was then resident in Antigua, to cause his firm to act as consignees for the estate. Messrs. McDonald consented, and they and their assignees acted as consignees until a receiver was appointed under the order of this Court. The objector, Mr. Bourne, voluntarily threw up the management of the estate in the year 1865. He now states that a sum of £249 16s. 5d. with interest from the 31st of August, 1864, is due to him, and he claims to be placed on the schedule in priority to the consignees, and if such priority be disallowed then to be placed rateably with them in regard to any balance due on their accounts between their appointment in the early part of 1863, and the time at which he gave up the management.

I have already decided that the consignees are entitled to priority in respect of the balance due to them from the time the objector resigned the management, and I adhere to that decision. It is in conformity with the invariable practice of this Court since it was instituted, and, in my judgment, with the only ground on which the rights of consignees can be supported—namely, that their advances maintained the property up to the time at which it was sold.

Although the sum in dispute is small, the second branch of the claim raises a question of importance in regard to West Indian interests. The rights of consignees and managers against the owners of West Indian plantations, including mortgages and persons having charges under settlements, have frequently engaged the attention of this and other Courts, but not one of those questions touched the right of priority as between consignees and managers.

Lord Kingsdown said in Fraser v. Burgess that he could not see a distinction between the claims of a consignee and a manager who had expended money in the cultivation of an estate as against the persons interested in the estate. I not only fully submit to the decision in that case, but entirely concur in it. Lord Kingsdown, however, spoke only in reference to the rights of consignees and managers as against the owners and mortgagees, and no question was raised in that appeal as to the respective rights of consignees and managers, the fund being sufficient to pay both. My learned predecessor decided that the manager had no claim against the estate, and that decision led to the appeal. Lord Kingsdown's statement of the law in that case consequently affords me no assistance on the present occasion.

Upon general usage and upon principle I do not think that the manager's contention can be supported. It is understood in the dealings with West Indian merchants that the consignee is to supply all the funds and all the supplies required for the cultivation of the plantation, in respect of which he acts as consignee; and that in consideration of such advances and supplies the produce is to be consigned to him, and if insufficient to meet his outlay his lien on the estate is to arise. To allow an owner or a manager to make an outlay upon the plantation independently of, and without notice to, the consignee, and in respect of it to give him a prior charge to, or an equality of charge with, the consignee, would certainly prejudice the security on which the consignee relied and made his advances, and would, in my opinion, be a fraud upon him, unless the circumstances were such as to render such outlay a matter of pressing and absolute necessity. Considering that the cultivation of the greater part of the sugar plantations in the West Indies is carried on by means of the advances made and the supplies furnished by consignees, I should feel great hesitation in disallowing the right to priority to which it is generally understood that they are entitled, although of course if such supposed right could not in law exist, I should have no alternative and would at once disallow it; but in the present case I am of opinion that no such difficulty or necessity arises. After the Messrs. McDonald were appointed consignees, any advances made by Mr. Bourne without notice to them were made at his own risk, and upon principle I think that his claim for them must be postponed to that of the consignees. A consignee deals with the estate, and, provided the person in the possession or management of it be in actual and apparently undisputed possession, it is quite indifferent to the consignee or his rights what may be the character of that possession. A tenant with a limited interest, a mortgagee in possession, or a manager, can all lawfully employ a consignee and give him the same rights; those rights arising from the necessity of the case and not from contract. The claim of a consignee resembles in principle a claim for salvage or a claim for payment of the fines upon renewable leaseholds. His outlay maintains and keeps in existence the property to which his right attaches. A manager on the contrary is merely the agent of the proprietor and cannot have a better title than he has. His first claim is against the proprietor, and it is only when he fails to satisfy it, that the manager can in case of a sale or other distribution of the corpus or proceeds of the property make a title to be paid out of the property. Such was the case in Fraser v. Burgess. The title of the consignee to be placed first on the schedule in that case was established in this court, and was not controverted in the appeal; but my predecessor disallowed the claim of the manager to be in any manner placed upon the schedule, and the Privy Council, acting under the advice of Lord Kingsdown, placed him on the schedule, holding that as all the persons entitled as owners or incumbents had concurred in his management they were bound to repay him the sums properly expended in that management.

The judgment proceeded entirely upon the principle of acquiescence on the part of the owners and mortgagees, and as the sale of the property prevented the payment of the manager by the parties interested in it, the Privy Council held that he was entitled to be paid out of the proceeds, treating him solely as the agent of those parties. The cases of Chambers v. Davidson and Scott v. Smith were also mentioned to me, but no point was decided in either of those cases bearing upon the present one. I do not think it necessary to remark upon the argument founded upon acquiescence. A consignee has no concern in, and can neither acquiesce in nor oppose the management of a plantation by any particular person, and cannot abandon any right by dealing with the person in the actual management, unless he be aware of, or has sufficient ground to suppose, fraud. I am therefore clearly of opinion that, upon all the principles of law applying to the rights of consignees, the consignee is, in respect of the debt due to him, entitled to priority over the manager. It has further been urged to us that as Mr. Bourne was appointed manager, or agricultural attorney, by the local Court of Chancery in 1853 he is entitled to priority. If any question turned upon the point, I should have great difficulty in holding that he was an officer of the local Court of Chancery, when at his request the Messrs. McDonald were appointed consignees in January or February, 1863. He passed no accounts before the Court, and, so far as appears, acted independently of and without any communication with it from the time of his appointment, and for several years he dealt with Mrs. Edwards, the widow of the former owner, as the owner, acted under her orders, and took his instructions from her. But it is unnecessary to decide the point, as the objector voluntarily and entirely, for his own purposes, retired from the management of the plantation in 1865, without applying for or obtaining any order or discharge from, or making any application to the local Court of Chancery, and without taking any steps to preserve such rights as he had, or any security for the balance which might be found due to him. I have now gone through in detail the principal grounds which have been so fully and ably urged before us in support of the objector's contention, and feel obliged to disallow them, and to decide in favour of the priority of the consignee. My decision would, however, have been the same, had I entertained a different opinion upon any of the points urged, as I think Mr. Bourne's conduct when he induced Messrs. McDonald to become consignees, as disclosed in his own affidavit, and his relinquishment of the management under the circumstances detailed by himself, would have barred him from claiming any priority as against them. As the case has been argued before us to-day at our request, I think that the objector ought to have the costs of the day, including those of the preliminary enquiries, out of the estate, and as the point appears to be new I shall make no order against him as to the other costs, notwithstanding that my decision is against his claim.

Feb. 25.—Mr. Bourne presented a petition in pursuance of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 117, s. 65, asking for leave to appeal to the Privy Council against the above order.

Tremlett, for Bourne, the petitioner, submitted that although the fund in court was small, yet the principle of law involved in the decision was one of great importance.

It appeared that the fund in court which would remain after payment of costs and of charges having priority over both Bourne and the consignees, would not amount to £200.

Mr. FLEMING, Q. C., Chief Commissioner.—This matter comes before us upon a petition presented in the name of Mr. Bourne, praying that he may be at liberty to appeal against our order, giving the consignees priority on the schedule to him in respect of a balance which he claims in respect of moneys expended by him whilst he acted as the manager of the estate which has been sold. The discretion given to us by the 65th section of the Act of 1854 is very ample, and, however anxious we may be to have the correctness of any decision given by us tested by an appeal to a higher court, we both feel that we should abandon a duty imposed upon us if we did not carefully consider whether in our discretion the matter ought to be carried further. In forming an opinion upon applications similar to the present, the amount of the sum the title to which is questioned must form a very material ingredient, although, of course many cases might arise in which we might feel it right to allow an appeal when the amount at stake was small, but the present is not one of those cases, and we feel bound to refuse the present application principally on account of the smallness of the sum. Although the point of law which has been so fully and ably argued before us may be new, it certainly is one which very rarely occurs, and during the whole of the time in which this Court has been so fully occupied with West Indian matters, it has never before been brought before us, and, considering the small amount of the sum, we cannot think that we should be justified in putting the gentleman in whose favour we have decided to the heavy costs of an appeal, or to delay the further administration of the estate in order to have an abstract question of law decided which has never before been involved in any of the cases tried by us, and which may never again arise. We also think it very questionable whether the Privy Council would deem it necessary to express an opinion upon the point, as, if they concurred in our view that Mr. Bourne's own conduct when he induced the Messrs. McDonald to become consignees, his silence as to any demand which he then had, or which he might expect to have, and his assurance that they were to have all the rights of consignees in regard to the plantation, as well as his conduct in voluntarily throwing up the management of the property without obtaining an order from or making any application to the local Court of Chancery, and without taking any steps to obtain from Mrs. Edwards, whom he treated and dealt with as owner, any personal security or any security upon the property, and the time which has elapsed since he left the estate without making any demand, were sufficient to bar his claim, it would be unnecessary to enter upon or decide the legal question. We refuse the present application, not only because the sum in question is so small, but also because we think that Mr. Bourne's own conduct, and especially his laesae, cannot justify us in granting leave to appeal.

COUNTY COURTS.

LAMBETH.

(Before R. J. CUST, Esq., Deputy-Judge.)

April 7.—The Great Northern Railway Company v. Gull.

A traveller with a return ticket returned by a mistake over another company's line, the ticket being shown to the officers of the second company's line, and not objected to until the traveller arrives at the end of his journey.

Held, that the second company had adopted the contract of the first and could not recover the fare from the traveller.

The defendant had taken a first class ticket from Moor-gate-street station to Sheffield and back by the Midland Railway. He went to Sheffield and on his return got into a Great Northern train. The tickets were twice looked at by officers of the company on the way, and defendant showed his, but on his arrival at Holloway, where he had to change carriages for Moorgate-street he was stopped, and the fare from Sheffield was demanded and refused. For the plaintiffs it was urged that either the defendant must have known that he was on the wrong line or he had negligently gone there, and that whether he had wilfully or negligently used the plaintiffs' line, he was liable to pay the fare. The two stations at Sheffield being nearly half a mile apart the defendant could not easily have mistaken one for the other, and as the plaintiffs had no arrangement with the Midland Company to mutually carry each others passengers, the plaintiffs' only remedy was to sue persons using their line with a Midland ticket.

MR. CUSK said the plaintiffs might have been right in this action if they had not examined the tickets, but they were certainly wrong in allowing the defendant to travel on their line with a Midland ticket, and only to object when he had nearly arrived at his journey's end. The passing of the ticket by the plaintiffs' servants amounted to an adoption of the Midland contract. It appeared from the evidence that this kind of mistake had been made before, and on the passenger refusing to pay, the plaintiffs had got the fare from the Midland Company. That was by far the best way of settling such a dispute. The judgment must be for the defendant.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. HENRY THURSTAN HOLLAND, barrister-at-law, has been appointed an Assistant Under-Secretary of State at the Colonial Office. Mr. Holland is the elder son and heir of Sir Henry Holland, Bart., the eminent physician, and was born in 1825. He was educated at Harrow and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1845; in November, 1849, he was called to the bar at the Inner Temple, and practised for some years on the Northern Circuit. Mr. Holland was, in January, 1867, appointed to the then newly-created office of Legal Adviser to the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

MR. FRANCIS DAVY LONGE, barrister-at-law, has been appointed by the Poor Law Board to act as a Poor Law Inspector for six months, during the absence from ill-health of Dr. Markham, and will take charge of the Gloucester and Monmouth district, recently vacated by the resignation of the late Mr. Graves. Mr. Longe was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1854; he was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in April, 1858, and formerly practised on the Norfolk Circuit. He was for some years an assistant commissioner under the Children's Employment Commission, and in 1866 he sat as one of the commissioners for inquiring into the prevalence of bribery in the borough of Totnes. In 1867, on the passing of the Reform Bill, he was one of the commissioners for settling the boundaries of Parliamentary boroughs; and in November, 1868, on the formation of the present Government, he was appointed private secretary to Mr. Goschen, President of the Poor Law Board.

MR. WALTER HYDE, solicitor, of Stockport, has been appointed Town Clerk of that borough, in succession to Mr. Henry Coppock, deceased. Mr. Hyde served his articles under the late Mr. Coppock, and was certificated in Hilary Term, 1864; in the following year he entered into partnership with Mr. Coppock, which continued till that gentleman's death.

MR. EDWARD REDDISH, LL.B., solicitor, of Stockport, has been elected Clerk to the magistrates of that borough, in the room of the late Mr. Henry Coppock. Mr. Reddish took out his certificate in Easter Term, 1851, and is a member of the local firm of Reddish & Lake.

MR. JOHN WYBERGH, jun., solicitor of Liverpool, has been re-appointed solicitor to the borough magistrates in appeal cases, at a salary of £200 per annum. Mr. Wybergh was certificated in Easter Term, 1840, and was formerly clerk to the Liverpool magistrates, which office he resigned about a year ago.

MR. JAMES BLACKLOCK LEE, solicitor (of Carrick, Lee & Sons, of Brampton and Haltwhistle), has been appointed Registrar of the County Court at Haltwhistle, Northumberland, and also Clerk to the Highway Board. Mr. Lee is a son of Mr. John Lee, registrar of the Brampton County Court, and was certificated in Michaelmas Term, 1860.

MR. GEORGE SMITH, of Leek, Stafford, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the county of Stafford.

MR. WILLIAM FITCHETT BURRELL, of Gosport, Hants, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the county of Hants.

LAW OF MASTER AND SERVANT.—Your letter is unsuited to our columns.

UNQUALIFIED PRACTITIONERS.

Sir,—I was glad to see a letter in your last issue on a matter which is certainly of very great interest to every solicitor—namely, the amount of injury which we suffer from the invasion of those who have neither received our education nor sunk the capital involved therein, yet who come in and take away the business that is rightly ours only.

No profession suffers so much from piracy as does ours, and I regret to say that the sympathy which any other practitioners would have from the public seems denied from vulgar and illogical prejudice to lawyers.

The various law societies should combine to prevent in some measure the constant practice of work being done by house agents, clerks, and other persons, which is the province of solicitors. Penalties and common informers do not seem to do much good, and I believe the only solution is one I have seen somewhere in print—viz., that every deed, &c., should require the signature of a certificated attorney, and that any attorney signing for an unqualified person who has done the work should be suspended and fined.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

April 8.—Medical Registration.—A bill to ensure a uniform and settled system was read a first time.

The High Court of Justice and Appellate Jurisdiction Bills were committed pro forma, and on the report a number of amendments were inserted.—The Lord Chancellor said he proposed to recommit them on the 29th inst.—Lord Denman gave notice that he should then move that the first bill be referred to a select committee.

The Irish Attorneys and the King's Inns.—Lord Chelmsford moved an address to the Crown for a commission to inquire into and report upon the total amount of the sums received by the Honourable Society of the King's Inns, Dublin, upon the admission of attorneys and solicitors as deposits for chambers, and in what manner the same or any part thereof has been applied and disposed of, and what portion of the amount remained unappropriated to the purposes for which it was received, and whether the Incorporated Society of Attorneys and Solicitors of Ireland are in possession of suitable buildings for the accommodation of that branch of the profession of which they are the governing body.—The Lord Chancellor said the inquiry proposed was the course most likely to bring about an amicable arrangement, and he hoped the inquiry would be entrusted to gentlemen of some weight, who would be able to bring the parties to a reasonable agreement, and thus benefit both branches of the profession.—Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

April 8.—The Irish Land Bill (Committee). Clause 3 resumed.—Mr. Kavanagh admitted that the decision of the preceding night must be final, but, for the sake of offering a few remarks, moved an amendment to draw the line at £100 instead of £50 annual value.—The amendment was ultimately withdrawn.—On the motion of Mr. Samuelson an amendment was added, limiting the amount of compensation in all cases to £250.—Mr. C. Fortescue inserted a proviso giving the smaller tenants the option of claiming for loss by eviction on the higher scale, or for improvements on the lower scale.—Mr. Pell, commenting on the concluding words of Mr. Fortescue's proviso, observed that there was a want of precision in the phraseology of the bill. There should be some more definite phrase than "reclamation of land."—Mr. C. Fortescue said the words were retrospective as well as prospective; and saw no ambiguity.—Mr. Pell asked whether land once reclaimed, but which had been allowed to lapse, could be "reclaimed" so as to be the subject of another charge. If the definition meant merely improvement and not merely recovery from a state of nature, why not class it with other improvements? A proposal by Mr. Pell to omit the word "reclamation" was negatived, and a suggestion by Lord Elcho to insert a limit of twenty years was deferred to a later clause.—Mr. Headlam moved to insert the following:—"Provided always that nothing in this Act contained shall exonerate a tenant under lease from the duty of giving up peaceable possession of the demised land at the end of the term, nor shall a landlord resuming possession at the termination of a lease be deemed to be disturbing a tenant within the meaning of this Act." His proposed addition could not by any means be construed as an attack on the principle of the bill, he only desired that it should be distinctly understood that the landlord would not be acting as a disturber in doing that which had always heretofore been quite legal and regular. He had expected that his amendment would be treated as a truism. On the expiration of a term, the landlord could by law step in without giving notice to quit; but if the tenant remained in over the term a new tenancy was created for a term indefinite, continuing till one or the other party gave notice to quit. Consequently, the landlord who closed the tenancy by giving this notice would become a disturber. As the bill stood, its effect would be that the tenant would not be allowed to contract to give up his holding peaceably at the end of his term.—The Attorney-General said the amendment would simply render the bill nugatory. Nobody ever questioned the doctrine that if a man took land for a certain number of years under a lease he was bound to quit at the end of the term without notice. His right hon. friend had urged that a landlord who entered upon possession of his land at the termination of his lease could not be regarded as a disturber, but he went further and contended that a landlord entering after notice upon land held from year to year could not be regarded as a disturber. If that were so, the argument fell to the ground, because it was entirely based upon a distinction which did not exist. The question involved in the bill was one of policy. The Government had never denied that they were asking Parliament to deal with the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland on different principles from those which prevailed in England, and if they were not justified in adopting that exceptional course, the whole bill must fall to the ground. The clause before the committee provided in substance that, with respect to tenants from year to year and having only short leases, the landlord who entered into possession should pay a certain amount in the shape of damages or compensation under certain circumstances. The effect of the adoption of the amendment, however, would be that any lease, however short, would disentitle the tenant to any claim to compensation.—Mr. Corrance would support the amendment.—Mr. Bruen hoped the committee would hold that deliberate contracts made by men able to take care of themselves should be enforced by law and not subjected to such exceptional legislation.—Sir Roundell Palmer said he had originally been unable to conceive why any lease whatever should be interfered with. As far as the principle went, he saw no reason to retract that opinion. Subsequently, Mr. Gladstone pointed out what had escaped his notice—namely, that the object of the bill was to protect the small tenants in Ireland with ordinary holdings from year to year, and that if in all future contracts the landlords were permitted to create tenancies, not from year to year, but for a single year, you would have the same kind of complication under the form of a perpetual legal notice to quit. He could not advocate any evasion of the spirit of the bill. He had had in view bona fide leases fairly entered into and clearly understood on both sides; and he had thought a seven years' lease would be a fair term. However, others who were equally desirous to legislate prudently thought a seven years' lease too short a term. For that reason, he had put on the notice paper an amendment proposing to substitute fourteen for thirty-one years as the term. He did not feel at liberty to vote for a proposition which he thought was only meant to raise a question of principle. He was of opinion that the Committee had not arrived at that stage of the bill when the question might fairly be raised, and therefore he could not support the proposition.—Sir G. Jenkinson protested against the infraction of the rights of property proposed by the bill.—Sir R. Anstruther would vote for the amendment on the ground that the interpretation clause of the bill was a violation of the principle of freedom of contract.—Lord C. Hamilton argued against any interference with the law of contract in Ireland.—Debate adjourned.

The Law of Evidence Further Amendment Act (1869) Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

Bridgwater, Beverley, and Norwich Disfranchisement.—The Attorney-General introduced two bills, one to disfranchise Beverley and Bridgwater and the other to disfranchise the scheduled voters in Norwich.

Conventual and Monastic Institutions.—Mr. Newdegate moved to nominate the select committee.—Mr. Cogan asked the House to withdraw its resolution.—Sir J. Simeon and Mr. Matthews supported him.—Lord Elcho supported the original decision.—Debate adjourned to the 28th.

The Habitual Criminals Act.—In reply to Mr. Hunt, Mr. Bruce stated that to the officers of police in the different towns of England and Wales weekly returns were issued of all the prisoners liberated from prison who were subject to police supervision; but no provision was made for the supervision of persons other than licence holders. A bill to amend the Habitual Criminals Act was about to be introduced into Parliament, and it was most probable that a clause giving effect to what appeared to be the intention of Parliament in this matter would be inserted.

The New Law Courts.—Mr. G. Gregory asked the first Commissioner of Works when he expected that the plan and design for the New Courts of Justice would be completed.—Mr. Ayrton was happy to say that considerable progress had been made with the plans; but, in consequence of the great number of persons who had to be consulted respecting them, he was quite unable to fix any day when they would be completed.

Trades Unions.—In reply to Mr. Winn, Mr. Bruce said he hoped to introduce a bill next session.

The Budget—The Stamp Duties.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced the Budget. Speaking of the stamp duties he said "The stamp laws commenced early in the reign of William III., and spread over an enormous number of stamps, so that even those who were most expert in such things had great difficulty in finding out the various instruments to which the law applied. The Board of Inland Revenue, however, are now engaged in preparing a measure for reducing the whole law with respect to stamps into a single Act. This is to be mainly a consolidation Act. It does not profess to deal in any philosophic or scientific manner with this most complicated and most difficult subject, but if the House will be satisfied to accept it as a consolidation, carefully executed, of the existing law, and will abstain—that most difficult abstention—from entering into the merits of all the stamps which are in operation, it may be possible to pass the measure in the course of the next few months. It will make certain changes in the stamp laws, which will be carefully explained to the House when the bill is under its consideration; and if the House will only exercise a little forbearance, and allow it to pass in this way, I do not despair, as I have just intimated, of its becoming law before the close of the present session. In order to induce the House to exercise that forbearance several changes will be proposed in the stamp laws, one or two of which I may mention; I cannot state them all on the present occasion. There is, in the first place, what is called the progressive duty. That is, speaking roughly, a duty of 10s. on every 1,080 words, except the first, and I can scarcely imagine any operation in which the human intellect can be more unprofitably employed than in counting those 1,080 words. The importance of a deed does not at all depend on its length, and deeds such as leases, for instance, are frequently too long, so that the present system very often works very oppressively. This progressive duty it is proposed to abolish, involving a loss to the revenue of £50,000. Then it is proposed to reduce the duty of 35s. on every deed where there is not an ad valorem stamp as well as the 30s. duty on attorneys' letters to 10s. each. In the case of copyhold there is a great hardship. Instead of getting into a copyhold by a single conveyance you are obliged to have two conveyances—one of surrender and one of admittance. It has been hitherto the practice to tax both; but we propose for the future to place the tax on the surrender, which will involve a loss of about £20,000. There will be a total loss of £200,000 on stamps; but that is only to be got through the forbearance of the House. If the House should go into every detail, it will be impossible to pass the bill to which I have referred, and if the bill be not passed we cannot very well get rid of the tax."

Corrupt Practices at Elections.—Mr. Gladstone moved for a select committee to inquire into the state of the law affecting such persons as have been reported guilty of corrupt practices by any Commission issued in accordance with the Acts 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, and who are now members of this House, and to recommend what proceedings, if any, should be taken by this House with respect to such members, and what alteration, if any, should be made in the law.—Mr. J. Lowther moved as an amendment that the committee be instructed to inquire into the operation of the Corrupt Practices Acts. He maintained that the law was perfectly well understood. He censured the manner in which the Election Commissioners had conducted their inquiries, and instanced the case of Bridgewater.—The Attorney-General said the Lord Chancellor, as well as the Solicitor-General and himself, could not find the law so clear as it was stated to be. Mr. Gladstone's inquiry was indispensable. With respect to the first part of the amendment—namely, a select committee to inquire into the operation of the Act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, there would be no opposition on the part of the Government; but they could not consent to an inquiry into the Commissions. They were unpopular because they did their duty. With respect to the observations which Mr. Lowther had made on Bridgewater and the observations which had fallen from the Chief Justice respecting the examination of Mr. Lovibond, it was not immaterial to observe that this Mr. Lovibond was at the head, he might say, of the bribery of his party. Mr. Lovibond was one of those who endeavoured to induce the candidate to spend money and to break the virtuous resolution they had come to of conducting the election purely. Of course, he must admit that some of the observations which fell from the Chief Justice were of a very severe character; but Mr. Justice Blackburn, though no doubt not differing from the rest of the Court, expressed the opinion that Mr. Lovibond did not answer many of the questions put to him in a satisfactory manner. The Solicitor-General and himself had since had more experience of Mr. Lovibond. They had both been at Taunton, and Mr. Lovibond, in the presence of the judge, had prevaricated just as he had done before the commissioners, so much so that the learned judge had allowed his hon. and learned friend to cross-examine Mr. Lovibond, though he had been called by his hon. and learned friend. Now, that was the sole case against these commissioners. No part of the conduct of the commissioners at all warranted such a resolution as that proposed by Mr. Lowther.—Ultimately Mr. J. Lowther withdrew his amendment on the understanding that it was not to be opposed, and that he was to be at liberty to move the first part of it as a substantive resolution.

April 12.—The House adjourned to the 25th.

The Digest of Law Commission hope they may be able by Christmas to present the proposed Digest of the law on the three selected subjects—viz., mortgages, easements, and bills of exchange.

Lord Tenterden, whose father (best known as Sir Charles Abbott) was Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench from 1818 till his death in 1832, died on the 10th April, aged 74. His lordship was the last surviving son of the late Chief Justice, and is succeeded by his nephew, a clerk in the Foreign Office.

FOREIGN TRIBUNALS & JURISPRUDENCE.

AMERICA.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Willard, Appellant, v. Taylor.

Specific performance—Act of February 25th, 1862—Legal tender—Contract made before the Act.

A lease, made before the passing of the Legal Tender Act, reserved to the plaintiff, the lessee, an option of purchase at a specified price. The plaintiff having exercised his option after the passing of the Legal Tender Act,

Held, that he was entitled to specific performance on condition of paying the purchase-money in gold.

In April, 1864, the defendant leased to the plaintiff the property in question, for ten years from the 1st of May following, at the yearly rent of 1,200 dols. The lease contained a covenant that the lessee should have the right or option of purchasing the premises, with the buildings and improvements thereon, at any time before the expiration of the lease, for the sum of 22,500 dols., payable as follows:—2,000 dols. in cash, and 2,000 dols., together with the interest on all the deferred instalments, each year thereafter until the whole was paid; the deferred payments to be secured by a deed of trust on the property, and the vendor to execute to the purchaser a warranty deed of the premises, subject to a yearly ground rent of 390 dols.

On the 15th of April, 1864, two weeks before the expiration of the period allowed the complainant for his election to purchase, he addressed a letter to the defendant, enclosing a cheque, payable to his order, on the Bank of America, in New York, for 2,000 dols., as the amount due on the 1st of May following on the purchase of the property, with a blank receipt for the money, and requesting the defendant to sign and return the receipt, and stating that if it were agreeable to the defendant he would have the deed of the property, and the trust deed to be executed by himself, prepared between that date and the 1st of May. To this letter the defendant, on the same day, replied that he had no time then to look into the business, and returned the cheque, expressing a wish to see the complainant for explanations before closing the matter. On the following morning the complainant called on the defendant and informed him that he had 2,000 dols. to make the first payment for the property, and offered the money to him. The money thus offered consisted of notes of the United States, made by Act of Congress a legal tender for debts. These the defendant refused to accept, stating that he understood the purchase money was to be paid in gold, and that gold he would accept, but not the notes, and give the receipt desired. These notes were at the time greatly depreciated in the market. On repeated occasions subsequently the complainant sent the same amount—2,000 dols.—in these United States notes to the defendant in payment of the cash instalment on the purchase, and as often were they refused by him. On one of these occasions a draft of the deed of conveyance to be executed by the defendant, and a draft of the trust deed to be executed by the complainant, were sent for examination, with the money. These deeds were returned by the defendant. At length, on the 29th of April the complainant, finding that the defendant had left the city, and perceiving that the purchase was not going to be completed within the period prescribed by the covenant in the lease, and apprehensive that unless legal proceedings were taken by him to enforce its execution, his rights thereunder might be lost, instituted the present suit. The bill prayed the court to decree specific performance of the agreement by the defendant, and the execution of a conveyance to the complainant; the latter offering to perform the agreement on his part according to its true intent and meaning.

FIELD, J., delivered the judgment of the Court:—The covenant in the lease giving the right or option to purchase the premises was in the nature of a continuing offer to sell. It was a proposition extending through the period of ten years, and being under seal must be regarded as made upon a sufficient consideration, and, therefore, one from which the defendant was not at liberty to recede. When accepted by the complainant by his notice to the defendant, a contract of sale between the parties was completed. This contract is plain and certain in its terms, and in its nature and in the circumstances attending its execution appears to be free from objection. The price stipulated for the property was a fair one. At the time its market value was under 150,000 dolls., and a greater increase than one half in value during the period of ten years could not then have been reasonably anticipated.

When a contract is of this character it is the usual practice of courts of equity to enforce its specific execution upon the application of the party who has complied with its stipulations on his part, or has reasonably and in good faith offered, and continues ready to comply with them. But it is not the invariable practice. This form of relief is not a matter of absolute right to either party; it is a matter vesting in the discretion of the court, to be exercised, upon a consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case. In Joyner v. Statham, 3 Atk., 388, Lord Hardwicke said: "The constant doctrine of this court is, that it is in their discretion, whether in such a bill they will decree a specific performance or leave the plaintiff to his remedy at law." And in Underwood v. Hitchcox, 1 Ves. Sen. 279, the same great judge said, in refusing to enforce a contract, "the rule of equity in carrying agreements into specific performance is well known, and the court is not obliged to decree every agreement entered into, though for valuable consideration, in strictness of law; it depending on the circumstances."

Later jurists, both in England and in the United States, have reiterated the same doctrine. Chancellor Kent, in Seymour v. Delancy, 6 Johns. Ch. 222, upon an extended review of the authorities on the subject, declares that it is a settled principle that a specific performance of a contract of sale is not a matter of course, but rests entirely in the discretion of the court upon a view of all the circumstances; and Chancellor Bates, of Delaware, in Godwin v. Collins, recently decided, upon a very full consideration of the adjudged cases, says that a patient examination of the whole course of decisions on this subject has left with him "no doubt that, as a matter of judicial history, such a discretion has always been exercised in administering this branch of equity jurisprudence." It is true the cases cited, in which the discretion of the court is asserted, arose upon contracts in which there existed some inequality or unfairness in the terms, by reason of which injustice would have followed a specific performance. But the same discretion is exercised where the contract is fair in its terms, if its enforcement, from subsequent events, or even from collateral circumstances, would work hardship or injustice to either of the parties. In the case of the City of London v. Nash, 1 Ves. Sen. 12, the defendant, a lessee, had covenanted to rebuild some houses, but, instead of doing this, he rebuilt only two of them and repaired the others. On a bill by the city for a specific performance, Lord Hardwicke held that the covenant was one which the court could specifically enforce; but said, "the most material objection for the defendant, and which has weight with me, is that the court is not obliged to decree a specific performance, and will not when it would be a hardship, as it would be here upon the defendant to oblige him, after having very largely repaired the houses, to pull them down and rebuild them." In Paine v. Brown (cited in Ramsden v. Hyllton, 2 Ves. Sen. 307), similar hardship, flowing from the specific execution of a contract, was made the ground for refusing the decree prayed. In that case the defendant was the owner of a small estate, devised to him on condition that if he sold it within twenty-five years one half of the purchase money should go to his brother. Having contracted to sell the property, and refusing to carry out the contract under the pretence that he was intoxicated at the time, a bill was filed to enforce its specific execution; but Lord Hardwicke is reported to have said that, without regard to the other circumstance, the hardship alone of losing half the purchase money, if the contract was carried into execution, was sufficient to determine the discretion of the court not to interfere, but to leave the parties to the law.

The discretion which may be exercised in this class of cases is not an arbitrary or capricious one, depending upon the mere pleasure of the court, but one which is controlled by the established doctrines and settled principles of equity. No positive rule can be laid down by which the action of the court can be determined in all cases. In general it may be said that the specific relief will be granted when it is apparent, from a view of all the circumstances of the particular case, that it will subserve the ends of justice; and that it will be withheld when, from a like view, it appears that it will produce hardship or injustice to either of the parties. It is not sufficient, as shown by the cases cited, to call forth the equitable interposition of the court, that the legal obligation under the contract to do the specific thing desired may be perfect. It must also appear that the specific enforcement will work no hardship or injustice, for if that result would follow the court will leave the parties to their remedies at law, unless the granting of the specific relief can be accompanied with conditions which will obviate that result. If that result can be thus obviated, a specific performance will generally in such cases be decreed conditionally. It is the advantage of a court of equity, as observed by Lord Redesdale in Davis v. Hone, 2 Sch. & Lef. 348, that it can modify the demands of parties according to justice; and where, as in that case, it would be inequitable, from a change of circumstances, to enforce a contract specifically, it may refuse its decree unless the party will consent to a conscientious modification of the contract; or, what would generally amount to the same thing, take a decree upon condition of doing or relinquishing certain things to the other party.

In the present case objection is taken to the action of the complainant, in offering in payment of the first instalment stipulated notes of the United States. It was insisted by the defendant at the time, and it is contended by his counsel now, that the covenant in the lease required payment for the property to be made in gold. The covenant does not in terms specify gold as the currency in which payment is to be made, but gold, it is said, must have been in the contemplation of the parties, as no other currency, except for small amounts, which could be discharged in silver, was at the time recognised by law as a legal tender for private debts. Although the contract in this case was not completed until the proposition of the defendant was accepted in April, 1864, after the passage of the Act of Congress making notes of the United States a legal tender for private debts, yet, as the proposition containing the terms of the contract was previously made, the contract itself must be construed as if it had been then concluded to take effect subsequently.

It is not our intention to express any opinion upon the constitutionality of the provision of the Act of Congress which makes the notes of the United States a legal tender for private debts, nor whether, if constitutional, the provision is to be limited in its application to contracts made subsequent to the passage of the Act. These questions are the subject of special consideration in other cases, and their solution is not required for the determination of the case before us. In the view we take of the case it is immaterial whether the constitutionality of the provision be affirmed or denied. The relief which the complainant seeks, rests, as already stated, in the sound discretion of the court; and, if granted, it may be accompanied with such conditions as will prevent hardship and insure justice to the defendant. The suit itself is an appeal to the equitable jurisdiction of the court, and in asking what is equitable to himself, the complainant necessarily submits himself to the judgment of the court, to do what it shall adjudge to be equitable to the defendant.

The kind of currency which the complainant offered is only important in considering the good faith of his conduct. A party does not forfeit his rights to the interposition of a court of equity to enforce a specific performance of a contract if he seasonably and in good faith offers to comply, and continues ready to comply, with its stipulations on his part, although he may err in estimating the extent of his obligations. It is only in courts of law that literal and exact performance is required. The Act of Congress had declared the notes of the United States to be a legal tender for all debts, without in terms making any distinction between debts contracted before, and those contracted after, its passage. Gold had almost entirely disappeared from circulation. The community at large used the notes of the United States in the discharge of all debts. They constituted in fact almost the entire currency of the country in 1864. They were received and paid out by the Government, and the validity of the Act declaring them a legal tender had been sustained by nearly every state Court before which the question had been raised. The defendant, it is true, insisted upon his right to payment in gold, but before the expiration of the period prescribed for the completion of the purchase, he left the city of Washington, and thus cut off the possibility of any other tender than the one made within the period. In the presence of this difficulty respecting the mode of payment, which could not be obviated by reason of the absence of the defendant, the complainant filed his bill, in which he states the question which had arisen between them, and invokes the aid of the Court in the matter, offering specifically to perform the contract on his part according to its true intent and meaning. He thus placed himself promptly and fairly before the court, expressing a willingness to do whatever it should adjudge he ought in equity and conscience to do in the execution of the contract. Nothing further could have been reasonably required of him under the circumstances, even if we should assume that the Act of Congress making the notes of the United States a legal tender does not apply to debts created before its passage, or, if applicable to such debts, is to that extent unconstitutional and void.

In the case of Chesterman v. Mann (9 Hare, 212) it was held by the Court of Chancery of England that where an underlessee had a covenant for the renewal of his lease upon paying to his lessor a fair proportion of the fines and expenses to which the lessor might be subjected in obtaining a renewal of his own term from the superior landlord, and of any increased rent upon such renewal, and there was a difference between the parties as to the amount to be paid by the underlessee, he might apply for a specific performance of the covenant, and submit the amount to be paid to the court. So here in this case, the complainant applies for a specific performance and submits the amount to be paid by him to the judgment of the court.

Upon a full consideration of the position of the defendant we perceive nothing which should preclude the complainant from claiming a specific performance of the contract. The only question remaining is, upon what terms shall the decree be made? and upon this we have no doubt.

The parties at the time the proposition to sell, embodied in the covenant of the lease, was made, had reference to the currency then recognised by law as a legal tender, which consisted only of gold and silver coin. It was for a specific number of dollars of that character that the offer to sell was made, and it strikes one at once as inequitable to compel a transfer of the property for notes, worth when tendered in the market only a little more than one half of the stipulated price. Such a substitution of notes for coin could not have been in the possible expectation of the parties. Nor is it reasonable to suppose, if it had been, that the covenant would ever have been inserted in the lease without some provision against the substitution. The complainant must, therefore, take his decree upon payment of the stipulated price in gold and silver coin. Whilst he seeks equity he must do equity.

There will, therefore, be a decree for the execution of a conveyance of the premises with warranty by the defendant to the complainant, subject to the yearly ground rent specified in the lease, upon the payment by the latter of the instalments past due, with legal interest thereon, in gold and silver coin of the United States, and executing a trust deed of the premises to the defendant as security for the payment of the remaining instalments as they respectively become due, with legal interest thereon, in like coin. The amounts to be paid and secured to be stated, and the form of the deeds to be settled by a master; the costs to be paid by the complainant.

CHASE, C.J.—I concur in the conclusion just announced—that the complainant is entitled to specific performance on payment of the price of the land in gold and silver coin—but am unable to yield my assent to the argument by which, in this case, it is supported.

NELSON, J.—I concur in the above.

Mr. John Henry Kennaway, barrister-at-law, of the Western Circuit, has been returned to Parliament (unopposed) as member for the eastern division of the county of Devon, in the room of Lord Courtenay. Mr. Kennaway is the eldest son and heir of Sir John Kennaway, Bart., of Escot, Devonshire, and was born in 1837. He was educated at Harrow, and afterwards proceeded to Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1860, having obtained a second-class in the first classical examination, and a first-class in the final examination in the schools of Law and Modern History. Mr. Kennaway was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in January, 1864, and became a member of the Western Circuit. He is the author of a work entitled "On Sherman's Track," giving an account of the principal scenes made famous during the late civil war in America.

OBITUARY.

MR. H. JESSEL.

The death of Mr. Henry Jessel, barrister-at-law, of the Midland Circuit, took place at his London residence, Craven-hill-gardens, on the 4th of April, at the age of forty-eight years. The late Mr. Jessel was educated at University College, London, and matriculated at the London University in 1839, where he achieved the second place in the mathematical examination; he graduated B.A. in 1843. He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in April, 1850, and had for some years practised on the Midland Circuit.

MR. W. THEOBALD.

Mr. William Theobald, barrister-at-law, expired on the 7th April, at Sutton Lodge, West Molesey, in the seventy-second year of his age. The deceased gentleman was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in May, 1833, and formerly practised as an advocate of the Supreme Court of Calcutta; for some years he held the appointment of Clerk of the Crown in the High Court of Bengal, which he resigned a few months ago.

MR. R. WALLER.

Mr. Robert Waller, solicitor, of Chesterfield, died at that place on the 4th of April, in the forty-eighth year of his age. He was certificated in Hilary Term, 1853, and was Registrar of the Chesterfield County Court, besides holding several offices connected with the local boards and turnpike trusts of the district. During the last general election he acted as local agent for the Conservative cause. He held the commission of captain in the Chesterfield rifle volunteer corps.

MR. C. R. WACE.

Mr. Charles Richard Wace, solicitor, of Ellesmere, Salop, died at Shrewsbury on the 28th March. Mr. Wace took out his certificate in Hilary Term, 1828, and was a Commissioner for administering oaths and also for taking affidavits.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

The next meeting will be held on Wednesday, the 20th of April, 1870, at 8 p.m., precisely, when Mr. R. Robinson will read a paper on "The punishment of Self Murderers." The council will meet at half-past seven.

The council will be asked to consider an invitation, received from the Statistical Society, to send delegates to a meeting to discuss the possibility of different societies combining together to provide house accommodation.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

LAW STUDENTS DEBATING SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society on Tuesday, the 12th of April, Mr. L. Hunter in the chair, the question for discussion was No. 452, legal:—The surface of certain land and the subjacent strata belong to different owners. The surface is in its natural state, without buildings, but the owner of it intends to build a house thereon. In the absence of any special stipulation on the subject, is he entitled to sufficient support from the subjacent strata to enable him to do so? (Richards v. Jenkins, 17 W. R. 30.) Mr. Stock, for Mr. Warmington, opened the debate in the affirmative, and after a well-sustained discussion the question was decided in the affirmative by a majority of one. The number of members present was twenty-four.

The following is the secretary's quarterly report, to which we referred last week.

To the Members of the Law Students' Debating Society. Gentlemen,—In compliance with the 15th rule of the society, I beg to lay before you a statement of the proceedings of the society during the past quarter, which commenced on the 11th of January, and terminated on the 29th of March last.

There have, during that time, been held twelve meetings, at which six legal and four jurisprudential questions have been discussed.

The average number of members present at the meetings.

has been twenty-six; the highest number present at any meeting has been thirty-four, and the lowest fourteen. The average length of the debates on legal and jurisprudential questions has been one hour and fifty minutes; the average number of the speakers ten, and of voters seventeen, of which latter on an average about twelve voted in person, and about four in the register.

Nine new members have been elected, and eighteen gentlemen have ceased to be members of the society. The number of ordinary members on the rolls of the society is 164.

At the meeting held on the 1st of February the clause in the 6th rule of the society imposing a fine of 6d. on every ordinary member absent without notice was repealed. No other alteration in the rules has been made.

During the past quarter the society have lost the valuable services of their late treasurer, Mr. Herbert, and of Mr. G. W. Byrnes, one of the auditors. Mr. A. G. Harvie was elected in Mr. Byrnes's place, and Mr. Leslie Hunter in the place of Mr. Herbert, and the society did me the honour of electing me as their secretary.

Mr. Walmisley, a member of this society, obtained one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society at his final examination last Hilary Term.

The society in every respect seems to be in a very satisfactory condition.

WILLIAM APPLETON, Honorary Secretary.

COMPENSATION FOR RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

The following petition has been presented to the House of Commons by the directors of the Brighton and other railway companies:—

"That the present state of the law respecting compensation to persons injured by accidents upon railways, and to the relatives of persons who have been killed by similar accidents, is productive of great hardship and injustice to your petitioners and all shareholders in railway companies. That your petitioners are compelled by law to carry all persons who offer themselves, at rates which are strictly limited by Acts of Parliament according to the distance and class of carriage of the journey, while, on the other hand, there is no limitation whatever of the amount of compensation that may be claimed by the passengers so carried or their relatives from your petitioners in case of accident. That the conveyance of passengers at high rates of speed upon railways is necessarily accompanied by risk from the failure of materials or of servants, against which it is impossible for a railway company at all times to guard, and that passengers travel by railway with the full knowledge that their journeys are subject to this unavoidable risk.

"That it is contrary to all commercial principles that companies should be compelled to enter into contracts attended with the risk of heavy damages, without being allowed to make such charges as may reasonably cover the risk. That in the conveyance of goods, the responsibility of carriers is limited for certain valuable articles and animals, unless the sender declares the increased value of the articles and pays an increased rate of carriage, and it may be limited in all cases by a reasonable special contract. That the reasonableness of a limitation of responsibility has been acknowledged by Parliament in the case of workmen's trains, where the compensation payable to any passenger injured is limited by law to £100 on the Metropolitan Railway, the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, and the Great Eastern Railway. That an additional hardship is imposed upon your petitioners and the shareholders of all other railway companies, and also upon the public generally, by the mode of legal proceedings for recovery of compensation.

"That such proceedings are in the great majority of cases brought in the ordinary courts before juries composed of different persons in almost every trial, unused to distinguish on evidence between true and fraudulent claims, and a regular system of advancing fraudulent claims has grown up in reliance upon the difficulty of exposure before this tribunal. That the expense of such proceedings is very heavy both for the companies and for the claimants; and the companies in case of success are unable to recover their costs from the defeated party, while successful claimants also are compelled to submit to large deductions for costs out of their compensation. That it would conduce to the interests both of bona fide claimants and of the companies that all such cases should be decided by a tribunal of arbitrators appointed by the Board of Trade. That such a tribunal already exists in cases where both parties consent under sections 25 and 26 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, and is compulsory upon both parties in the case of workmen's trains on the Metropolitan, London, Chatham, and Dover, and Great Eastern Railways.

"Your petitioners therefore humbly pray that your honourable house will limit the amount of compensation payable upon ordinary passenger tickets, and will give the right to the passenger of insuring for a larger amount; and that all claims for compensations for accidents may be compulsorily referred to arbitrators appointed by the Board of Trade; and that your petitioners may have such other relief as to your honourable house may seem expedient.

"And your petitioners will ever pray, &c."

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds commenced with dullness but soon improved. Railways underwent an improvement immediately before the introduction of the Budget, on the speculation of its comprising a remission of the passenger duty. On the whole, the Budget has been received with evident satisfaction, and the effect has been to render the funds strong at an advance in price. The improvement has communicated itself to other markets; railways are in brisk demand and foreign securities show great firmness.

The Committee of Policyholders, Annuitants, and Shareholders of the Albert Life Assurance Company, have convened a general meeting of the policyholders to be held at the City Terminus Hotel, on Thursday, the 28th instant, for the purpose of considering the plan of re-construction.

CALL TO THE BAR.—Miss L. Burkulow was admitted to the Bar of Missouri on the 25th of March (Lady-day). She was a student of the St. Louis law school.

Messrs. A. Sperling (barrister-at-law) and E. Hicks have been elected Deputy Chairmen of the Cambridgeshire Quarter Sessions. Mr. Sperling was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in November, 1861.

Among the candidates for the vacant registrarship of the University of Oxford we observe the names of Mr. John C. Wilson, M.A., of Exeter College, barrister-at-law, of Lincoln's-inn, and Mr. George Loveday, M.A., of Brasenose, attorney-at-law, and proctor, of Doctors'-commons, London.

Mr. Weir Anderson, solicitor, of Liverpool, who for many years held the position of law agent to the Conservative party in Lancashire, has been appointed Commissioner to the Trust and Loan Company of Upper Canada, and was recently entertained at a banquet previous to his departure for that country. The following resolution has also been passed by the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool on the occasion:—"The Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool tender their congratulations to Mr. Weir Anderson, a member of the society, on the appointment he has received in Canada, and desire to convey to him their sense of the honourable and gentlemanlike manner in which he has always conducted himself as a member of the profession in Liverpool."

LONDON, APRIL 23, 1870.

ON THE PRINCIPLE omnia presumuntur rite esse acta in public offices there is a presumption that a letter correctly addressed and posted reaches its destination in due course. But is this a presumption of fact or of law, and if of law, is it rebuttable or irrebuttable? On this point there has been considerable litigation, the latest case being The Gresham House Estate Company (Limited) v. The Rossa Grande Gold Mining Company (Limited), which was heard before the Court of Queen's Bench on Wednesday last. It has been attempted to be argued that as if A. sends a notice to B. by an agent he must not only prove that he delivered the notice to the agent, but that the agent delivered it to B., so if he sends it by post he makes the Post-office his agent, and must not only prove posting, but also delivery, but, as was said by Baron Alderson in Stocken v. Collen (7 M. & W. 515), "if the doctrine that the Post-office is only the agent for the delivery of the notice is correct, no one could safely avail himself of that mode of transmission." The true doctrine is, as endorsed by the Lord Chief Justice on Wednesday last, that if it be proved that a letter is correctly addressed and posted and is not returned to the sender, it will be presumed that it was received in due course, but this presumption can be rebutted. Farther than this it may be laid down that if a notice has to be given on a certain day, and a letter is posted containing such notice so that it would, in the ordinary course, arrive at its destination on the proper day, but it is delayed in the post, "the sender has done all that is required of him," and is "not answerable for the blunder of the post office" (vide Stocken v. Collen (ubi sup.), and Dunlop v. Higgins (1 H. L. 381)).

The presumption is often adopted by the Legislature, and rendered conclusive (see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 89, s. 63, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 56, s. 51). In the Metropolitan Buildings and Management Bill now before Parliament, it is proposed to require proof not only of addressing and posting, but also of registration, in order to raise the presumption of delivery. This is analogous to the Indian Code of Civil Procedure, s. 66.

THERE ARE NOT LESS THAN THREE BILLS now before Parliament on the principle of codification. The earliest in point of date is the Merchant Shipping Code prepared under the auspices of the Board of Trade; next there is the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, brought in by Lord Penzance; and lastly, the Metropolitan Buildings and Management Act, of which Sir W. Tite is godfather. These bills do not propose to alter the existing law on the subjects with which they respectively deal in its material features, but to consolidate and arrange in better order the existing enactments, which being thus superseded can be swept out of the statute-book by repeal. Lord Penzance's bill will thus supersede the eight Acts of Parliament, all passed since 1856, to which we have now to look for the law relating to divorce and matrimonial causes. Sir William Tite's bill proposes to repeal the whole of five Acts and parts of two more, while the Merchant Shipping Code will supersede about a dozen statutes. This last bill contains 692 clauses; but then if the mercantile community do not gain much in the matter of brevity they may in that of method or symmetrical arrangement, which, according to Jeremy Bentham, is one of the characteristics of a model legal system.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS has been working away at its arrears of appeal cases, and has given a large number of decisions lately, one or two of them being on points of much interest and importance. On the 4th ult. was affirmed the decision of the Exchequer Chamber, delivered as far back as 1860, in Castrique v. Imrie (9 W. R. 455, 8 C. B. N. S. 415), a case of much importance to shipowners, shippers, and commercial men generally, turning as it does on the validity of a foreign judgment, where the foreign Court has proceeded on a mistaken view of the law of England.

It is well settled that if a foreign Court, in pronouncing a decision in a proceeding in personam, mistakes the law of this country, so far as that law by the comity of nations forms a part of the case, the English Courts will review, and, if necessary, set aside its decision. The rule is otherwise as to a judgment in rem, but in Castrique v. Imrie, Cockburn, C.J., in delivering his own judgment, announced that there was a difference of opinion between the members of the Court upon the question whether an English Court ought to set aside a foreign judgment in rem when grounded on a perverse and wilful disregard of an English lex loci contractus. It was not necessary, however, to decide that question, because the French Court had bond fide endeavoured to follow the English lex loci contractus, though it had been unsuccessful in so doing. In Simpson v. Fogo (1 H. & M. 247) the present Lord Chancellor, when Vice-Chancellor, expressed his own adherence to "the view of that section of the judges who considered, in the case of Castrique v. Imrie, that even a judgment in rem may lose its binding force where there appears on the face of it a perverse and deliberate refusal to recognise the law of the country by which title has been validly conferred.

Castrique v. Imrie is, therefore, an authority ruling that a foreign judgment in rem will not be set aside for merely misinterpreting the English law; but the most important question involved in the case was whether the proceeding in the French court was in rem or in personam. The facts were that the owner of a British ship called the Anne Martin transferred her by bill of sale, while on a voyage, in 1853, to Melbourne and Madras. Meanwhile the master when at Melbourne drew a bill for necessities on his owner, which the new owner dishonoured. Afterwards, the ship touching at Havre, a French subject, to whom the bill had been endorsed, instituted proceedings in the Tribunal de Commerce at Havre against both the master and the ship, and that Court condemned the master "en sa qualité de capitaine de l'Ann Martin et par privilege sur ce navire" to pay the sum due on the bill, and in default the ship was sold. This the Court of Common Pleas held to be a proceeding in personam; the Court of Exchequer reversed this judgment, holding that the proceeding was a proceeding in rem to enforce the privilege or lien against the ship. The latter decision the House of Lords have now affirmed, and the point is one of considerable importance.

This case has been a long time pending; whether the fault be with the litigants or the judicial system of the House of Lords we are unable to say. The Tribunal de Commerce at Havre pronounced its judgment as far back as 1855; the owner's suit to replevy the ship was dismissed by the same tribunal in the autumn of the same year, the Court acting upon a mistaken idea that by the English law it was impossible that the property in the ship could be transferred by the bill of sale as the new owner contended. In 1856, Sir A. E. Cockburn, as Attorney-General, wrote an opinion pointing out this error, which, however, though brought before the Cour Imperiale at Rouen upon an appeal to that tribunal, had not the effect of producing a reversal of the decision of the Court at Havre. Then, in 1860, the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer Chamber delivered their respective judgments, Sir A. E. Cockburn giving his decision in the latter as Lord Chief Justice; and now, ten years later, the decision having been in the meantime cited in innumerable cases as from the Exchequer Chamber, the House of Lords have finally adjudicated upon the case. What an awkward thing it might have been if the decision of the Exchequer Chamber had after all been reversed!

IN HIS DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL Lord Penzance proposes to make no alteration in the existing rule of law whereby a married woman can only obtain a protection order when deserted by her husband. If his ill-usage of her is such that she can have him bound over to keep the peace and could petition for judicial separation, still she cannot apply for a protection order. The theory, we suppose, is that a judicial separation operates as a protection order, and that a woman ill-used by her husband can protect herself by petitioning the Court for a judicial separation. But various causes may prevent her from petitioning, and even if she does petition, some time must elapse before the decree. Under both these circumstances she may want her earnings protected from her husband, and it is worth considering whether provision should not be made for such want.

AN EXTRAORDINARY CONVICTION by justices was brought before the Court of Queen's Bench on Wednesday last, the first day of Term, in the case of The Queen v. Tomlinson. The defendant was charged before the justices at Swansea with smuggling some cigars. One of the justices thought that there was sufficient evidence that the offence had been committed; the other justice thought that the evidence was not sufficient to support a conviction. The justice who was satisfied with the evidence insisted on convicting the defendant, notwithstanding the dissent of the other justice, on the ground that the statute allowed one justice to hear such a charge.

The defendant was accordingly convicted and fined, but he subsequently obtained a certiorari to quash the conviction. The application on Wednesday was for the purpose of enlarging the time within which the defendant could enter into the necessary recognizances for costs. The Court granted a delay until next term, although it seemed there had already been some delay and neglect in not entering into these cognizances earlier, on the ground that the conviction appeared to be flagrantly wrong.

There may, no doubt, be some explanation of this conviction, but as stated in the application on Wednesday it is one of the most curious we have ever heard of. It certainly did not give the defendant the benefit of the doubt, to which in criminal proceedings a defendant is supposed to be always entitled.

MR. NEWDEGATE'S COMMITTEE on Monastic and Conventual Institutions is very unpalatable to the Roman Catholic inhabitants of the kingdom, if we may judge from their loud outcries in the daily papers. They stigmatise it as an oppression and an insult. On the other hand, it is retorted by those of the Exeter Hall persuasion, "There must be something horrible or you would not object to evade the scrutiny." That, however, is a non sequitur. For our own part, we decidedly approve of a thorough investigation into "monastic and conventual institutions," including the sisterhoods and other establishments, not only of Roman Catholics but of all other religionists. The inquiry should be directed especially to the property of these associations and their members. We believe that on this head an inquiry is really needed, and that if there were anything which ought to be disclosed on any other matter it would probably come out on a well directed investigation into the very popular subject of property. We do not undervalue the virtues of self-denial and benevolence when we say that it is not healthy or expedient that young persons, young ladies especially, should be induced, under the influence of ideas, in part, no doubt, benevolent, but in part also of a morbid sentimentalism, to execute voluntary settlements of their property in favour of certain sisterhoods and other institutions of which they may have become members. Such settlements, however, are frequently made by inmates not only of Roman Catholic consent, but of the Protestant sisterhoods attached, for instance, to some of the "Ritual" churches, under circumstances which a court of equity would unhesitatingly class in the category of "undue influence." We do not mean that the influence is necessarily exerted from motives of personal selfishness. It is considered by some lawyers that restraint ought to be placed by the Legislature upon gifts of this kind whether by will or inter vivos, but especially the former. We are not, for ourselves, prepared to go that length, certainly not in the absence of the results of an investigation. But we should support a scheme for obtaining from all monastic and conventual institutions periodical accounts of their property; and we believe that such publicity would tend to check very much the system of which we disapprove.

As to the legal position of nuns under the English law, they were, of course, before the Reformation, civiliter mortua :—

"When a man entreateth into religion and is professed, he is dead in the law, and his son or next cousin incontinent shall inherit him as well as though he were dead indeed. And when he entreateth into religion he may make his testament and his executors; and they may have an action of debt due to him before his entry into religion, or any other action that executors may have, as though he were dead indeed, &c."—Co. Litt. 200.

In modern times it has been decided by the Lords Justices that a nun is not to be held civiliter mortua (Re Metcalfe's Will, 12 W. R. 538, 3 N. R. 657). The consequence may often be that the convent now gets what before the Reformation would have gone over; in the case cited, the Lords Justices, overruling a decision of Lord Romilly, refused to withhold a legacy from an inmate of the Brompton Oratory. The Master of the Rolls had considered that the Court had express notice that the lady was under duress, and "could not be regarded as morally capable of resisting any pressure put upon her by her spiritual directors." The Lords Justices, admitting that such might be the case, ruled that the Court could not "speculate upon her intentions," and could not "refuse to a person in her senses, and under no legal disability, the payment of a fund to which she was absolutely entitled, merely because she was likely to deal with it in a manner which the Court might think unwise."

In an Irish case of Whyte v. Meade (2 Ir. Eq. 423) the Court set aside a deed which had been obtained from a young lady by duress and undue influence exercised over her while in a convent. In McCarthy v. McCarthy (9 Ir. Eq. 621), evidence was given that some young ladies, members of an Ursuline convent near Cork had by duress been got to sign a transfer of their share in their father's assets to the superioresses of the convent. The nuns were joined as formal parties in a suit by these assignees against a brother who was the administrator, but the Lord Chancellor of Ireland refused to interfere in such a suit, and directed an issue to try whether or no the deed was obtained by the exercise of undue influence. The issue was not accepted, and the plaintiffs appealed from a consequent decree dismissing the bill (1 H. L. 703). The Lords held that it was irregular, in point of practice, thus to decree an issue between the plaintiffs, and they dismissed the bill for misjoinder, observing that the question as to the undue influence could not properly be tried in that suit. And it may be regarded as conclusively ruled that though the courts of equity would incline strongly to avoid a settlement or deed of gift made by a nun, on the ground of undue influence, if she came forward to invoke their aid,—they will not refuse to pay a fund into her hands merely because she is a nun and likely to get no personal benefit from it.

EVERYONE WHO HAS EVER had to peruse a deed engrossed on one or more skins of parchment in the old and still customary form knows what a most unwieldy, flapping, inconvenient thing it is to manage. The conveyancing counsel usually peruses copies only, but if by any chance an original deed should be inflicted upon him, his disgust is great. Of late years some solicitors have adopted the excellent plan of having their deeds engrossed "bookwise," in which case they are as easy to manage as the old fashioned skins are troublesome. It is stated, however, that law stationers do not encourage the new plan because the reverse side of parchment is not quite easy to write on. This might be met either by some change in the preparation of the parchment, or if that be impossible, by a small addition to the charge for engrossing. If all solicitors will, as no doubt they one day will, have their deeds engrossed bookwise and in common text-hand, the reform will, though an humble one, save a very great deal of time and trouble, some expense, and a great many mistakes.

PURCHASE FOR VALUE WITHOUT NOTICE.

The doctrine respecting the rights of a purchaser for value without notice is as old as any other doctrine of the Court of Equity: even the black letter reports are full of decisions upon it. It is popularly considered as one of the most solid doctrines of the court, and so it is, but still anyone who takes the pains to delve at all deeply into the mass of decisions in which it has been implicated finds that its application, nay its very terms, are by no means precisely marked out. It is possible that this incertitude may be in some measure attributable to the peculiar hardship which usually is involved in cases of this kind. Cases in which the contention of purchase for value without notice is set up are mostly cases in which some absent person has been guilty of fraud or misconduct, and the disagreeable duty is cast upon the Court of apportioning the consequences as between two or more parties of equal moral innocence.

The favour shown by the law to purchasers was in some of the cases reported in the older chancery reports, such as Freeman, Finch, &c., carried very great lengths in behalf of purchasers for value without notice—much farther indeed than the Courts would now be disposed to go. We shall notice this when referring to the power of an equitable incumbrancer to protect himself by getting in an outstanding legal estate.

The substantial rule is that the Court does not stir against a purchaser for value without notice. Basset v. Nosworthy (Finch 102, 2 Wh. & Ta. 3) is the best of the early cases. There the defendant purchased from a devisee; the heir filed a bill alleging that the will had been revoked, and praying discovery, but the defendant pleading purchase for value without notice, the Court allowed the plea. There seems at one time to have been an idea that the defence was good only as against the legal title (see Lord Westbury in Phillips v. Phillips, 10 W. R. 236, 31 L. J. Ch. 326). Conversely it has been argued, and there are cases which support the view, that this defence cannot be pleaded as against the legal title. Both these views were wrong.

The first seems to have arisen from a mistaken view of the equitable maxim Qui prior est tempore, potior est jure, arguing thence that as between equitable claimants the Court must always leave them to their priority in point of time, whereas the Court only resorts to the test of priority in time when the equities are equal in other respects. The confusion is between equitable claimants at large and parties claiming as equitable incum-brancers. As regards the former, it is a part of the equity that the purchase was made for value without notice; as, for instance, where a sale has been made by collusion or mistake, and the purchaser is afterwards opposed by the injured persons. But as between mere equitable incumbrancers, it is firmly settled that they rank strictly in order of priority in point of time; saving, of course, to each the possibility of squeezing out those before him by getting in the legal estate and "taking" his incumbrance on to it.

The second of the above views was much pressed in Attorney-General v. Wilkins (17 Beav. 285), in which the Master of the Rolls, after an elaborate investigation of the authorities, which he pronounced to be contradictory, ruled that the defence is maintainable against the legal estate. "My opinion is," said his Lordship, "that when you once establish that a person is a purchaser for value without notice, this Court will give no assistance against him, but the right must be enforced at law."

But though the defence of purchaser for value without notice can be raised by one equitable claimant against another, or against the legal estate, it is not accurate to say that the Court of Equity will never stir against the purchaser for value without notice.

The truth is, this defence is merely a shield, and nothing more (Vice-Chancellor Wood in Stackhouse v. Countess of Jersey, 9 W. R. 453, 1 J. & H. 730); it is a creature of the Court of Equity, a defence unknown at common law, which is allowed in equity.

Lord Westbury in Phillips v. Phillips (supra) says that there is a distinction between cases in which the Court of Equity is asked under its auxiliary jurisdiction to assist the possessor of a legal title or has under its own peculiar jurisdiction to decide between equitable claimants, and cases in which it exercises a legal jurisdiction concurrently with the courts of law. In the former cases the Court of Equity gives aid only on its own terms, and will not interfere against the purchase without notice. E.g., Basset v. Nosworthy (supra), and Wallwyn v. Lee (9 Ves. 24), in which, the bill being filed to obtain only the delivery up of deeds from a person with whom they had been pledged, Lord Eldon refused to order him to give them up. In the latter case equity follows the law and ignores the defence of purchaser for value without notice.

Thus, in Williams v. Lambe (3 Bro. C. C. 264), Lord Thurlow said the defence could not be pleaded to a widow's bill for dower; and in Collins v. Archer (1 R. & M. 284), Sir John Leach held it no answer to a bill for tithes. This distinction, if well founded, will explain many of the apparently contradictory decisions; contradictions, however, still remain. Thus, in D'Arcy v. Blake (2 Soh. & Lef. 389), Lord Redesdale ruled that the Court of Equity would not assist a widow to her dower as against a purchaser for value without notice; which was directly contradictory to Williams v. Lambe (supra). In Colyer v. Finch, 19 Beav. 500, the right of a legal mortgagee to foreclose was resisted by an equitable incumbrancer, on the ground that as he was a purchaser for value without notice, the Court should give no relief as against him. The Master of the Rolls overruled the objection, laying it down that though the Court will not assist against a purchaser for value without notice, assist to enforce the legal right; yet where the legal right is clear, and attached to it is an equitable remedy enforceable only in equity, the Court will not refuse to enforce it, even against a purchaser for value without notice. On appeal to the House of Lords (5 H. L. 905) the foreclosure was upheld on another ground—viz., that foreclosure is not relief, but rather a right correlative to the mortgagor's right of redemption; the Master of the Rolls' reasoning was not disapproved of, but as it was invented for a purpose for which it was found unnecessary, it is merely extrajudicial.

Lord Westbury seems to us to have hit out the best distinction. We cannot consider his distinction altogether satisfactory, but we prefer it to any other.

It is certainly unfortunate that in such a fundamental doctrine there should still remain room for so much doubt.

It must always be remembered that this defence of purchase for value without notice is a shield, and nothing more. Therefore if the subject of litigation be a fund in medio, which the Court must award to some one, the Court will award it to the legal title, or whoever has the best right to call for it. This is well pointed out in Stackhouse v. Countess of Jersey (supra).

Very frequently the relief asked against the purchaser has been the delivery up of deeds, and on this point again there has been some contradiction.

In Joyce v. De Moleyns (2 Jo. & Lat. 274) Lord St. Leonards, when Lord Chancellor of Ireland, considered Wallwyn v. Lee (supra) as conclusively ruling that the Court of Equity will not deprive the purchaser of the deeds. In Fraser v. Jones (17 L. J. Ch. 253) Lord Cottenham inclined to differ from Joyce v. De Moleyns, but hesitated to overrule that case, and in the end got out of the difficulty by holding that the purchaser had notice. In Stackhouse v. Countess of Jersey (supra) Vice-Chancellor Wood appeared to be of the same opinion as Lord Cottenham. In Thorpe v. Holdsworth (17 W. R. 394, L. R. 7 Eq. 147) Vice-Chancellor Giffard intimated that were the matter res integra he should be of the same opinion, but considered himself bound by the authorities not to order delivery up of the deeds. He, however, ordered them to be produced on a sale by the plaintiffs. In the quite recent case of Newton v. Newton (17 W. R. 238, L. R. 4 Ch. 144) decided by Lord Hatherley a few weeks after Thorpe v. Holdsworth, a very reasonable distinction is drawn, and the rule on this branch of the subject may now be taken to be, that while, in accordance with the principle of Wallwyn v. Lee, the Court will not interfere against the purchaser when the delivery of the deeds is the sole object of the suit; yet when, in consequence of the property contended for being in medio, the Court is obliged to award it to someone, the Court will—acting on the principle of Smith v. Chichester (2 Dr. & War. 402), that the right to the estate confers the possession of the deeds—order them to be given to the claimant who establishes his right to the property.

It is a part of the privilege of purchaser for value without notice, that even after notice he may protect himself by getting in an outstanding legal estate or the like. This branch of the subject is an instance of the lengths to which the doctrine was of old pushed as in favour of the purchaser. Thus, in Sir John Fagg's case (cited 1 Vern. 52), it was carried to this length, that Sir John Fagg, being such a purchaser, came into a man's study, and there seeing on the table a statute which would have fallen on the land, stole it, and the Court refused to oust him from the position he so nefariously obtained. The case is but very meagrely reported, but the fact would seem to be that having taken a bad title by misfortune, the Court allowed him to retrieve the misfortune by fraud. As Vice-Chancellor Wood observed in Carter v. Carter, (8 K. & J. 637)—“It is sufficiently clear that a case to such an extent as that would never be upheld.” And in Culpeper's case (cited in Sanders v. Deligne, Freem. Ch., 124), a man bought gavelkind land of the eldest son, without knowledge that it was gavelkind, “and afterwards for a song bought in the titles of the younger brothers who were ignorant of their titles.” The Court of Equity refused to relieve them at the purchaser's expense, for that “the purchaser having honestly paid his money without notice, may use what means he can to fortify his title.” A purchaser would hardly now-a-days be permitted to employ fraud in order to avoid the defect of which he had originally no notice, but he may clearly avail himself of the most technical defence possible. The Court, however, will not permit this to be done by taking a conveyance from a trustee to the injury of the cestuis que trust. The distinction was put very sensibly by Vice-Chancellor Wood in Carter v. Carter (supra) as follows:—

“Although you may get in any outstanding legal estate which a person may bonâ fide assign to you, you having notice of the intervening incumbrance,” (His Honour was speaking of successive equitable incumbrancers) “he not having any such notice, you cannot procure a conveyance from a trustee who himself has an adverse duty to perform, and who by such a conveyance would, in fact, be making over the estate to you, to protect you against the very interests which it was his duty to protect. That is so rational that one wonders the question should have arisen twice.”

Within the short space of a single article it is not possible to do more than summarise the main points of the subject, but we must call attention to the principle established in older cases and not since abandoned, that a purchaser who has notice of a claim in equity, if he take from a purchaser without notice, gets the full benefit of the latter's position. “It certainly is the rule of this Court that a man who is a purchaser with notice himself from a person who bought without notice, may shelter himself under the first purchaser, or otherwise it would very much clog the sale of estates” (Lord Hardwicke in Lonther v. Carlton, 2 Atk. 242).

THE NON-REGULATION PROVINCES OF BRITISH INDIA.

The attention of the English public has been called to the state of the law in what are called the Non-Regulation Provinces of British India by Mr. Broughton's very interesting pamphlet now before us.* By Non-Regulation Provinces are meant provinces acquired by conquest or annexation, which have not been brought under the operation of the General Laws and Regulations in force in British India. These provinces, so far from being “outlying and uncivilised places,” as they were described to be by the present able Secretary of State for India in a speech delivered by him not long ago in the House of Lords, constitute by far the greater half of our possessions in India, and include such vast territories as British Burmah, the Central Provinces, the Punjab, and Oudh.

From a period antecedent to the present century up to the year 1833 the Governor-General of India and his Council were invested with the sole power of making Regulations for the Bengal Presidency, and the Governors in Council of Fort St. George and Bombay with a like power with respect to their presidencies respectively. In 1833, by the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 43, the Governor-General in Council alone was authorised to legislate for the whole of India, by making Laws and Regulations which should have the same force as Acts of Parliament, section 40 providing that the Fourth Ordinary Member of the Council of the Governor-General should be appointed from among persons other than servants of the late East India Company, and should not sit or vote in the Council except at meetings thereof for making Laws and Regulations. By virtue of this provision the post of Fourth Member of Council was first filled by the late Lord Macaulay, who again was succeeded by such able lawyers and jurists as Andrew Amos, Charles Hay Cameron, Drinkwater Bethune, and (last, though not least) Sir Barnes Peacock, afterwards Chief Justice of Bengal.

In 1853, however, under the auspices of that eminent statesman the Marquis of Dalhousie, the Legislative Council of the Governor-General was, by the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 85, severed from his Executive Council, the former consisting of the latter with the addition of eight members, of whom six were to be appointed from among the civil servants of the East India Company, and the other two to be the Chief Justice and one of the other judges of the Supreme Court at Calcutta. The six civil servants so to be appointed were usually appointed from each of the several presidencies or divisions of presidencies; and thus a dash or flavour of the representative element was for the first time infused into the Legislative Council of India. The Council, as then composed, consisted of no less than three legal members—namely, the Fourth Ordinary Member of the Governor-General's Executive Council (the restriction as to whose sitting or voting in that Council at meetings thereof for the purpose of making Laws and Regulations only having of course been removed), the Chief Justice, and his brother judge—all of them able lawyers, as from their position they might have well been presumed to be, and as indeed they had actually proved themselves to be. Without attempting to eulogise the chief justices and judges of the Supreme Court who in that capacity sat as members of the Legislative Council, the bare mention of their names (Sir Lawrence Peel and Sir James Colville, both of whom are now members of her Majesty's Privy Council; Sir Charles Jackson, the late President of the Bank of Bombay Commission; Sir Arthur Buller, late M.P. for Liskeard; and Sir Mordaunt Wells) will suffice to convey some notion of the order of men whose assistance the Council was fortunate in thus obtaining. Then, again, the Council was assisted in the drafting of its laws by the legal skill and acumen of the first Clerk of the Council, Sir Walter Morgan, the present able Chief Justice of the North-Western Provinces of India, and afterwards of Macleod Wylie, the failure of whose health was the sole cause of his early retirement and of the consequent loss of his valuable services to the State; and undoubtedly, whatever the cause may have been, the legislation of that time stands unequalled by anything before or since, according to the opinion of those who are best able to judge of such matters, embracing as it did such enactments as the Penal Code, the Codes of Civil and Criminal Procedure, the Bengal rent law and sale law as they are called (constituting in fact the entire law of landlord and tenant for the Bengal Presidency), a comprehensive law of limitation for all India, a law of evidence, the Peace Preservation and Rebellion Suppression Acts (consequent on the late Indian mutiny), and various other Acts too numerous to be mentioned particularly.

The independence of the judges, however, caused the downfall of this Council. Their sin consisted in asking for information having reference to the power of that somewhat obstructive Secretary of State for India, Lord Halifax (then Sir Charles Wood), not only without the consent of his Council, but apparently also in opposition to their opinion, to make wholly unauthorised and certainly very singular grants of public money from the Indian Exchequer to certain prodigal, not to say profligate, native princes. This information was sought for by the judges in order to enable them to legislate intelligently, and because they felt themselves in duty bound to ask for it at a time when the Council had been called upon to pass Acts empowering the Government to levy new and heavy taxes on the people. So inconvenient was it found to supply the information, and so little grateful apparently was the Secretary of State to the judges for having pointed out the illegality of his proceedings in connection with those grants, that he brought in a bill which, while it deprived the judges of their legislative powers, did not scruple to legalise ex post facto all his illegal grants. The distinctive feature of this bill (which was passed into law in 1861, and stands in the Statute Book as the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 67) was to divide the Legislative Council of India into four separate Legislatures, one for each of the three presidencies, and the fourth being what is known as the Imperial Legislative Council or the Legislative Council of the Governor-General, and having power not only to legislate for the whole of India on matters not purely local, political, or fiscal, but also having sole power to legislate for the courts of justice established by Royal charter. The constitution of the new Councils (apart from the question of decentralisation) is one of the greatest anomalies in modern times. Being professedly a Legislative Council, one would think that it should have been strong, or at least not weak, in at all events the legal element. But on reference to section 3 of the statute which relates to the Legislative Council of the Governor-General, it will be seen that authority is given to the Governor-General to nominate not less than six nor more than twelve additional councillors (i.e., in addition to the members of the Executive Council), of whom not less than one-half should not be in the civil or military service of the Crown in India. This authority has usually been exercised by the Governor-General in the nomination of two gentlemen of the mercantile community in Calcutta, one official for each presidency, and two natives who seldom or never take part in the proceedings of the Council, and who indeed have sometimes happened to be independent native princes, aliens in short. While, therefore, the representative element has expanded, the legal element has been dwarfed by the elimination of the judges; and practically, since the passing of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 67, the gentleman corresponding to what was formerly called the Fourth Ordinary Member of the Council of the Governor-General has been the only legal member of the new and enlarged (so called) Legislative Council. Fortunately for the Council the post of legal member has been successively held by such distinguished lawyers as William Ritchie, Henry Sumner Maine, and FitzJames Stephen, who again have been assisted by able secretaries like Macleod Wylie, Arthur Macpherson (now one of the judges of the High Court of Calcutta), Charles Boulnois (now Chief Judge of the Chief Court in Oudh), and the present able incumbent of that office, Whitley Stokes, not only well-known here as the author of many valuable legal treatises, and as one of the most promising conveyancers of his day, but whose antiquarian reputation is world-wide. Although, however, the fortunate possession by the Council of an able member and secretary has gone far to cure the great defect in its constitution, still their ability cannot remove the anomaly to which we have referred, and the fact remains as patent as ever that the real work of the Council is done by those two officials alone.

This, therefore, until lately, was the body in whom was vested the power of legislating for the Non-Regulation Provinces. Previously to 1861 the Executive Government (without the intervention of the Legislative Council) legislated for these provinces. But since the passing of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 77, no legislative power exists in India which is not derived from that statute. To prevent, however, a wholesale cancellation of essentially legislative rules, section 25 gave the force of law to all rules made previously for Non-Regulation Provinces by the then constituted authorities, thus suddenly establishing as law a heterogeneous mass of rules which were so dubiously expressed that (according to Mr. Maine) "the difficulty of ascertaining what is law and what is not, in the former Non-Regulation Provinces, is really incredible." "The necessity for authoritatively declaring rules of this kind" (adds Mr. Maine), "for putting them into precise language, for amending them when their policy is doubted, or when, tried by the severer judicial tests now applied to them, they give different results from those intended by their authors, is among the most imperative causes of legislation."

By a bill which was introduced into the House of Lords last year by the Secretary of State for India it was proposed to invest the Governor-General, acting without his Legislative Council, with the power of passing laws for the Non-Regulation Provinces in India; and it is this proposal which has given rise to Mr. Broughton's remarks as contained in the pamphlet now under review. Although the bill has since passed into law, it may not be out of place to consider the objections which Mr. Broughton has urged to the then proposed measure. These objections may be best stated briefly as follows, in Mr. Broughton's own words:—"I shall show that the law in Non-Regulation Provinces is in a state of extreme complication and uncertainty, traceable to a want of publicity, and to the assumption of legislative powers by those to whom such powers were never given; that from want of sufficient consideration the legislative authority has been led into errors in making laws which must have a most prejudicial effect upon private rights, upon the progress of the country, and upon the welfare of its inhabitants; that the Government of India has not the means of obtaining information upon which to base legislation for the Non-Regulation Provinces; and, therefore, that, instead of dispensing with a legislative body in dealing with these important provinces, it would be more proper to increase its strength, and to provide in each province a staff of law officers, such as now exists in the presidencies, whose duty it would be to keep the Government informed not only of existing facts, but of their bearing upon the local laws."

That the law in the Non-Regulation Provinces is extremely complicated and uncertain is clear from Mr. Maine's own opinion which we have above cited. That the Governor-General should dispense with the assistance of his Legislative Council in legislating for these provinces we would look upon as purely and simply a retrograde measure, and, if anything, as more objectionable even than the present anomalous constitution of that Council arising from the inadequate number of legal members in it. As to the necessity of strengthening the Council, at least in its legal element, we need not add to what we have already urged upon that point. Lastly, with regard to the proposition that there should be in each province, as there is at each of the three presidencies, a proper staff of law officers to advise the Government upon all matters upon which legislation may be found necessary, this is after all a mere matter of £ s. d. Whether the Government will or can entertain such a proposition must, we apprehend, depend upon its financial condition. We trust, however, that purely economic considerations (sometimes another name for parsimony) will not be permitted to stand in the way of so great a desideratum, not to say necessity, as Mr. Broughton has clearly and satisfactorily established.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

RESULTING TRUSTS.

Bird v. Harris, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 375, L. R. 9 Eq. 204.

Where there is a devise upon trust for particular purposes which do not exhaust the whole beneficial interest, the surplus shall be a resulting trust for the heir-at-law: Hill v. Bishop of London, 1 Atk. 618. Where, however, the devise is not upon trust for, but subject to and charged with, particular purposes, the devisee shall take the surplus beneficially. King v. Denison, 1 V. & B. 260, where the devise was in fee subject to and chargeable with annuities, and Lord Eldon decided that the devisee took beneficially, is perhaps the leading case on this subject. As a general rule, therefore, where property is given subject to or charged with the performance of a duty, there is no resulting trust of the surplus for the persons who would be entitled in case of intestacy. This we say is the general rule, but there may be a context in the will that will give the words "subject and chargeable," or their equivalents, some other meaning.

In the case before us property was given to the executors "in and for the consideration" of paying the rents to A. for life. The Court held that these words meant "for the purpose of," and that when the purpose was fulfilled, there was a resulting trust of the corpus for the heir-at-law and the next of kin. The will, it should be observed, was rather informal, and had been drawn by the testator's medical attendant.

The case resembled Barrs v. Fenkes (13 W. R. 987), where the residue was given to the executor "to enable him to carry into effect the purpose of the will"; and the Court held that there was a resulting trust. The fact that the gift was to the executor was probably an element in the determination of both cases. In Dawson v. Clarke (15 Ves. 409), both "trust" and "charge" occurred, and Lord Eldon, from the context, concluded that the surplus was given beneficially, the burden of proof being on those who asserted the existence of a trust to show that the intention was to create a trust.

THE WRIT OF PROHIBITION.

Ex parte John Bateman, V. C. J., 18 W. R. 425.

Where an inferior court is assuming a jurisdiction which does not belong to it the proper course for the party aggrieved is to sue out the writ of prohibition. The practice is settled by 1 Will. 4. c. 21, which provides that applications for the writ may be made upon affidavit only, rendering unnecessary the suggestion which, under the old practice, had to be entered as of record, containing a statement of the facts upon which the writ was asked for.

The Court of Queen's Bench is the proper origin of the writ; it being the function of that Court to limit the jurisdiction of all other courts (Company of Horner's case, 2 Roll. Rep. 471) except, of course, the Court of Chancery. At the present day, prohibitions issue to inferior courts from all those courts at Westminster indiscriminately. Since the passing of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, any judge of the courts of common law has been enabled (section 22) to hear applications for the writ in vacation as well as in term. Formerly the writ was issued only in term, and hence the practice of applying to the Court of Chancery for the writ in vacation (Anon, 1 P. Wms. 476). By analogy, the Court of Chancery used to grant the writ of habeas corpus when the courts of common law were not sitting (Crowley's case, 2 Swanst. 1; see Hale's "Pleas of the Crown," vol. 2, 147). It is now the ordinary practice for a judge of the Court of Chancery to grant a prohibition at anytime, under the common law jurisdiction of the Court (Re Foster, 6 W. R. 448).

The prohibition in the case before us issued to a Spiritual Court, to restrain it from trying the right to a pew in a parish church. Questions like this are in general within the jurisdiction of the local Spiritual Court; but in the present case the right to the pew was claimed by prescription, and in such cases it is well settled that prohibition will go to the Spiritual Court, which is incompetent to deal with the points of law involved in a claim of such a character (Com. Dig. tit. "Eglise" G. III.).

Application for the writ may, it seems, be made ex parte, and will be granted on proper evidence, reserving to the parties affected liberty to move to dissolve the order: Re Mayor (Turn. & Russ. 314), where the form of the writ will be found, p. 316. The Vice-Chancellor followed this precedent, though to have made an order nisi would, in his opinion, have been the preferable course.

COMMON LAW.

INSPECTION OF DOCUMENTS—14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 6—PRACTICE.

Cosy v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, 18 W. R. 493.

Woolly v. The North London Railway Company (17 W. R. 797) laid down the rule that reports made in the ordinary course of business or in the usual discharge of duty by one officer of a company to another officer or to the board of directors are not privileged from inspection under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 6, whether made before or after litigation, and whether containing matters of fact or of opinion. If, however, reports are obtained confidentially from the officers of a company or from other persons concerning evidence or opinions with a view to litigation they are privileged, and the other party in the action is not entitled to inspect them.

Cossey v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company follows this decision, and it was also held that reports obtained by the defendants with a view to expected litigation were privileged, although no action had been commenced, or even formally threatened. The chief importance of Cossey v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company is that it explains Baker v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (16 W. R. 126), a case which has given rise to some discussion.

In Baker's case the action was by executors for damages for the death of the testator, caused by an accident upon the defendants' railway. The defendants pleaded not guilty, and also that the testator had received £75 as accord and satisfaction for the cause of action. The defendants had sent a clerk and their medical officer to see the testator, and to negotiate with him as to a settlement of his claim. Ultimately, through these negotiations, the testator accepted £75 by way of compensation, as was alleged, for his injuries, and he died soon afterwards. In the action that followed, the Court allowed the executors to have inspection of reports made by the clerk and the medical officer to the defendants concerning the negotiations with the testator.

It has been sometimes suggested that this decision is inconsistent with the rule which exempts from liability to inspection communications made with a view to litigation. In Cossey's case, however, the true ground of the judgment in Baker's case is explained to be that the reports in Baker's case were not simply reports for the information of the defendants, but were evidence of an agreement between the testator and the defendants for the settlement of the testator's claim. In order to establish the plea of accord and satisfaction, the defendants must have relied on the communications between their agents and the testator, and inspection of the reports of those agents was allowed because such reports would be evidence of that agreement. On this ground Baker's case is distinguishable from most other cases where the rule as to privileged communications of this kind has been discussed. It should also be noticed that as the testator had died the plaintiffs might be without evidence to contradict the defendants' plea of accord and satisfaction.

As a matter of fact, there was a replication in Baker's case of fraud, although this is not stated in the reports of the case. The Court in Cossey's case, in distinguishing that decision from Baker's case, rely on this replication of fraud, of which they were informed by counsel during the argument. We believe that in fact the replication of fraud was added under a judge's order after the decision as to the inspection of the reports, and, therefore, it did not influence the judgment of the court as to that inspection. The decision in Baker's case, seems, however, to be quite clear on the ground we first mentioned, and is quite reconcilable with the other decisions on the subject.

REVIEWS.

Hints to the Clergy in respect to Life Assurance. By the Rev. JOHN HODGSON, M.A., Secretary to the Clergy Mutual Assurance Society. London: Nichols & Sons.

This pamphlet is penned by the secretary of the Clergy Mutual Assurance Society to congratulate his clerical brethren on the success of the society in question and to recommend it still further to their favour. Mr. Hodgson says, statistics prove that clergymen on the average live longer than laymen, and has constructed a "Clergy Experience Table" from which he quotes to the effect that 500 clergymen will live 900 years longer than 500 laymen, and Mr. Hodgson's argument is that it is on this account the interest of the cloth to insure with a society restricted in the main to their profession. Mr. Hodgson is a case in point; he is now eighty-two and has been insured forty years in the society he now advocates. He refers to various statistics of which the reader may judge for himself, since this subject is foreign to our scope.

Upon the recently popular topic of insurance commissions Mr. Hodgson makes an observation to which we must take exception. In the course of his strenuous invitation to his brethren to patronise the society of which he is one of the founders, Mr. Hodgson says—"Again, many, I may say most, clergymen being about to be married assure their lives for the purpose of a marriage settlement; and whenever this is the case, unless a clergyman gives directions specially to the contrary, his solicitor will, as is usual, recommend him to make his life assurance in an office which will pay him (the solicitor) a handsome commission for so doing."

Now, a solicitor asked to recommend an office to his client, might or might not recommend one which would pay him (the solicitor) a handsome commission, but we are quite sure that, taking, as Mr. Hodgson professes to do in his statistics, the average, the solicitor would not recommend any office unless he felt he could do so conscientiously. If Mr. Hodgson's argument is good for anything, it seems that the man of law would choose an inferior office for the sake of his own emolument, which we feel assured he would not. It is not becoming in a clergyman to speak evil lightly of another profession, not even that "good may come."

English Law and Irish Tenure. By FREDERICK WAYMOUTH GIBBS, C.B., Barrister-at-Law. London: Ridgway.

This is an interesting and thoughtfully-written pamphlet on the great question of the day. Mr. Gibbs' view is that the law which answers well in England fails in Ireland, because not there supplemented by the usages which prevail in England. For remedy he prefers the extension of tenant right to compulsory leases, "not doubting that the introduction of leases is the goal to be aimed at, but doubting the wisdom of forcing leases on the country." He therefore supports the legislation proposed by the Government Bill of this session, both in its compensation and purchase provisions. Mr. Gibbs has gone well, but not tediously, into the history of Irish tenures and the attempts made at legislative remedies; and we can recommend this pamphlet to those who desire to see in a small compass the leading facts of the question.

COURTS.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

April 20.—Re Born.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125 and 126—Rule 260—Injunction to restrain proceedings—Joint debt.

The debtor in this case had carried on business jointly with one Puzey. He had filed a petition for liquidation under the 425th and 126th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869; and application was now made on his behalf under the 260th of the new rules for an injunction restraining certain creditors from taking any further proceedings in the actions brought by them against him.

Mr. Rosher (solicitor), in support of the application.

Nicholson, for one of the creditors at whose suit an action was pending, pointed out that the debt in respect to which the action had been brought was a joint debt due from the debtor and Puzey. The writ had been served upon the debtor alone, Puzey being out of the way, and it was contended that the Court ought not to stay an action against the two jointly, otherwise the creditor's right against Puzey would be prejudiced.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that if the parties were joint debtors it was impossible that the proceedings could be stayed upon a petition by one debtor alone.

Mr. Rosher said that, under existing circumstances, the debtor Puzey could not make the application. He stated that the partnership between the parties had been dissolved, and he only asked for an order restraining the proceedings as against the one debtor.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—I am asked to make an order restraining the proceedings against one debtor, who is admitted to be jointly indebted with another. That is unreasonable and unjust; the debt cannot be severed or divided. The application must be refused, but without costs.

Solicitor for the creditor, A. Watson.

Re Grogyn.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125 & 126—Inaccuracy of list of creditors—Practice.

Mr. Dalton Miller (solicitor), for the debtor, who had filed a petition for liquidation, applied for the direction of the Court upon the refusal of Mr. Keene to register a resolution of creditors come to at a meeting appointed for that purpose.

It appeared that, in consequence of an inadvertence, the names of some four of the creditors of the debtor had been omitted from the list, but the error had been rectified to some extent by notice being served upon them by the solicitor; and it was alleged that two of the creditors whose names had been omitted attended the meeting and proved their debts, and that the other two had declined to take any trouble in the matter or to prove their debts.

Mr. Miller applied for leave to register the resolution, notwithstanding that the three days allowed by the rules for that purpose had expired, the same having been lodged in due time, with leave to amend the accounts; or, in the alternative, for the appointment of another meeting of the creditors. He stated that when the resolution was laid before the registrar he declined to receive it on the ground that notice had not been given by the proper officer of the first meeting of creditors, and he referred the debtor to this Court. He cited Re Rogers, 14 Sol. Jour, 453.

The CHIEF JUDGE said the debtor must follow the practice indicated by the case cited, and give proper notices before he could hold a valid meeting or base upon it any valid resolution of creditors. It would be a mischievous thing to introduce the loose practice of giving notice by any person other than the proper officer for that purpose. An amended list of creditors must be furnished to the registrar, and, that being done, the notices would be given and the meeting held. Then the proceedings would go on in proper form.

Order accordingly.

COUNTY COURTS.

GREENWICH.

(Before R. J. CREST, Esq., Deputy Judge.)

April 6, 13.—Sims v. Cowan.

Church Building Act—Parish Clerk's Fees.

The parish clerk of the mother church is entitled to receive the clerk's fees on marriages solemnised in a district chapelry.

This was an action brought by the parish clerk of the parish of Greenwich against the vicar of the district chapelry of St. John the Evangelist in the same parish to recover the clerk's fees on certain marriages which had been solemnised in the district chapelry.

The vicar admitted having received the fees in question, but disputed the right of the plaintiff to take them, on the ground that by the formation of the district chapelry the fees had been transferred to the clerk of the district chapelry. The statutes on which the question turned are fully stated in the judgment.

The plaintiff appeared in person.

Mr. James, for the defendant, put in the Order in Council dated 30th January, 1868, by which the district chapelry was constituted.

April 13.—Mr. CREST.—The plaintiff in this case is the parish clerk of St. Alphege, Greenwich, and he sues the defendant, who is the minister of the district chapelry of St. John the Evangelist, at Blackheath, in the same parish, for the sum of £3 19s. 6d., being the amount of certain fees received by the defendant on behalf or for the use of the clerk of the above named district chapelry in respect of marriages solemnised in the church of St. John the Evangelist between the 2nd of April, 1868, and the 31st December, 1869. The action is brought to try the right of the plaintiff to receive the customary clerk's fees on marriages solemnised within the district chapelry, and it is admitted for the purposes of the action that the fees claimed have been actually received by defendant. It is also admitted that the fees in question are the usual fees which the clerk of St. Alphege has always been entitled to in respect of marriages solemnised in that parish. Unless, therefore, it can be shown that the right to receive these fees has been extinguished or transferred to some other person, that right will remain vested in the plaintiff. The district chapelry of St. John the Evangelist is a new district formed out of the parish of St. Alphege by an Order in Council dated the 30th of January, 1868, and expressed to be made in pursuance of the statutes 59 Geo. 3, c. 134, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 25. The above Order in Council, after reciting a representation by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners that it would be expedient that a certain part of the parish of St. Alphege should be assigned as a district chapelry to the church of St. John the Evangelist, and that it would be expedient that banns should be published, and that marriages, baptisms, and christenings should be solemnised or performed in such church, and that the fees to be received in respect of the publication of such banns and of the solemnisation or performance of the said offices should be paid and belong to the same church for the time being, her Majesty was pleased to ratify the same representation and to order and direct that the same should be effectual in law from the time when the said Order should be published in the London Gazette. The above Order was duly published in the London Gazette on the 31st January, 1868, and the marriages in respect of which the fees now claimed have been received have been solemnised since that date. The question, therefore, is whether the effect of the above Order in Council has been to take away from the plaintiff the right to receive the fees in question. The Order in Council is founded upon and derives its validity from the statutes therein recited, of which the only one which is material to the present question is the statute of 59 Geo. 3, c. 134, passed in the year 1819, to amend and enlarge the provisions of the statute 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, passed in the preceding year. The above Acts provided three modes by which populous parishes might be divided. Under the 16th section of the Act of 1818, the parish might be divided into two or more distinct and independent parishes, in which case the tithes were appropriated between the two ministers. Under the 21st section of the same Act a parish might be divided into ecclesiastical districts, to be called district parishes, in which case the tithes remained with the incumbent of the mother church, and under the 16th section of the Act of 1819 a portion of a parish might be assigned to a church or chapel, in which case it was to be called a district chapelry, and served by a curate, but subject to the control of the incumbent of the mother church. In the two former cases the minister's fees were transferred, subject to existing interests, to the incumbents of the new division or district. In the third case it is provided by the 16th section of the Act of 1819 that the Commissioners shall determine whether any and what part of the fees shall be assigned to the curate of the district chapelry. The above provisions relate only to the minister's fees. It is, however, provided by the 10th section of the Act of 1819 that when "a parish shall be divided under the provisions of the said recited Act, or this Act, all fees, dues, profits, and emoluments belonging to the parish clerk or sexton respectively of any such parish, whether by prescription, usage, or otherwise, which shall thereafter arise in any district or division of any parish divided under the provisions of the said recited Acts, shall belong to and be recoverable by the clerks and sextons respectively of each of the divisions respectively of the parish to which they shall be assigned in like manner, in every respect, and after the same rates, as they were before recoverable by the clerk and sexton of the original parish." The above section, however, only applies to cases where a parish has been divided under the provisions of one of the above Acts, and the fees referred to are described as the fees to arise in the district or division of the divided parish. The fees in the present case arise in a district chapelry formed under the 16th section of the Act of 1819. The question is whether the 10th section of the Act of 1819 extends to the case of such district chapelries. I think it does not. The district chapelry was not intended to be a division or independent district, but was to remain subject to the control of the incumbent of the mother church, and to be served by his curate, who was to receive only such part of the fees as the Commissioners should assign to him. As, therefore, the curate of the district chapelry was not intended to receive the minister's fees except so far as they might be allowed to him, and no provision was made for the allotment of the clerk's fees, it must be presumed that the Legislature did not intend to deal with the clerk's fees in such cases. It was not intended to give to the minister of the district chapelry any independent existence, and it is not probable, therefore, that the clerk would be placed in a better position. The position of the minister of a district chapelry, formed under the 10th section of the Act of 1819, has been much improved by some of the recent Church Building Acts; but so far as I can ascertain by examining the Acts there are no provisions giving the clerks of district chapelries any right to fees. The statute 7 & 8 Vict., c. 70, s. 10, contains certain provisions as to clerk's fees in the case of consolidated chapelries formed under 6th section of the Act of 1819, but these consolidated chapelries are wholly distinct from district chapelries, like the one now under consideration. I may mention here that the statute 19 & 20 Vict., c. 104, s. 12, which was cited by the plaintiff, has reference only to districts formed under the Acts known as Lord Blandford's Acts, and has no operation in respect of districts formed like the present one under the Church Building Act. A question very similar to the present came under the consideration of the Court of Exchequer in the case of Roberts v. Aulton, 2 H. & N. 432, in which the Court adopted the above construction of the 10th section of the Act of 1819; and I am therefore able to refer to the above case as an authority for my decision. As, therefore, it is conceded that but for some statutory enactment to the contrary the plaintiff would have been entitled to the fees now claimed, and it does not appear that they have been by any statutory enactment either extinguished or transferred to any other person, I must hold that the right to receive them remains in the plaintiff, and that he is entitled to judgment for the amount claimed.

WEST INDIAN INCUMBERED ESTATES COURT. WESTMINSTER.

(Before Mr. FLEMING, Q.C., and Mr. CUST, Commissioners.)
Dec. 3, Feb. 25.—Re Eales; Ex parte Eales. The Longville Estate.

A mortgagee who succeeds to a moiety of the estate as heir-at-law may retain his status of mortgagee as against subsequent incumbrancers.

In this case, the Longville estate, in the Island of Jamaica, containing 2,000 acres, with the live and dead stock thereon, had been sold under an order of the Commissioners for £1,820, and the schedule of incumbrances now came on for settlement. The estate formerly belonged to Christopher Thomas Eales, who, on the 19th of May, 1865, mortgaged it to John Roberts to secure £900. In April, 1866, Roberts having become embarrassed, made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors; and, on the 22nd of December, 1865, the above mortgage was assigned by Roberts' trustees to Christopher Eales, father of the above-named Christopher Thomas Eales.

On the 27th of June, 1865, Christopher Thomas Eales conveyed one moiety of the estate to George Turland; and on the 2nd of December, 1866, he died, leaving his father, Christopher Eales, his heir-at-law under the Jamaica statute, 3 Vict. c. 34.

Christopher Thomas Eales died in Jamaica, his father, Christopher Eales, being at that time in London, and the news of the death of Christopher Thomas Eales did not reach his father until after the date of the assignment of the mortgage. Christopher Eales took possession of the estate immediately after the date of the assignment, and expended considerable sums in its cultivation and management; and he claimed to hold the estate as mortgagee and to add the amount he expended to his mortgage. Two adverse claims had been filed, one by William Drummond Jones, who claimed as consignee, and one by William Samuel Paine, who claimed as a mortgagee of forty head of cattle, but Paine's mortgage was subsequent in date to that of Christopher Eales.

It was objected that the position of Christopher Eales as being owner of a moiety of the estate precluded him from charging against subsequent incumbrancers anything beyond the principal and interest due on his mortgage.

Archibald Smith, for Christopher Eales, contended that the accident of his being, by the death of his son, become heir to one-half of the estate, that circumstance not being known to him at the date of the transfer, did not deprive him of the rights of a mortgagee in possession, and that he was entitled to adopt whichever position he found most beneficial to himself. He cited Toulmin v. Steere, 3 Mer. 210; Davis v. Barrett, 14 Beav. 542; Richards v. Richards, Johns. 754; Otter v. Lord Vaur, 6 D. M. & G. 634. He disputed the claim of Jones, the consignee, on the ground that there was another consignee acting at the same time.

G. S. Airey, for Jones, the consignee.

Smith Guscotte and Wadham, for Paine, the second mortgagee.

Mr. FLEMING, Chief Commissioner.—I reserved my judgment in this matter in order more fully to consider the various points so ably and fully urged by Mr. Archibald Smith, but such further consideration has only tended to confirm the views which I entertained at the hearing, and to satisfy me that Mr. Jones, as the last consignee, ought to be placed at the head of the incumbrancers. Mr. Archibald Smith did not reopen the question so often debated in this Court, and he admitted the general right of a consignee to priority over ordinary incumbrancers, but he denied that Mr. Jones was a consignee, or at least such a consignee as to entitle him to priority. Mr. Jones claimed to have acted as consignee in the year 1866, and sought to be placed on the schedule in regard to the balance due upon his accounts for that year. Mr. Archibald Smith, for the petitioner, contested his title upon two grounds: first, that Mr. Roberts was consignee until his bankruptcy in April, 1866, and that there could not be two consignees of the same estate; and secondly that Mr. Roberts' mortgage deed contained a provision by which the owner agreed to consign all the sugar grown on the plantation to him. There was no evidence before the Court to show that any moneys were supplied for the estate by Mr. Roberts during the three first months of 1866, although I was informed that the petitioner was in a position to establish that some payments had been made. I, however, considered it unnecessary to give evidence of that fact, as my decision could not be affected by it. I do not upon principle see any objection to two persons acting as consignees of the same estate at the same time, and the case of Simond v. Hibert (1 R. & M. 719) establishes that there is no objection in law. In fact, cases might arise in which it would be absolutely necessary to employ two consignees, as if the acting consignee became from embarrassments unable to furnish the supplies, the cultivation of the plantation could not be continued unless another consignee were employed; and I must say, considering that Mr. Roberts failed in April, 1866, something of the kind appears to me to have occurred in the present case, even if some payments were made early in 1866, as it is highly improbable that Mr. Roberts, on the eve of bankruptcy, could be in a position to furnish the necessary supplies, or that Mr. Eales would, without ample cause, have sought the aid of a fresh consignee.

Mr. Archibald Smith urged that many frauds might be carried on if the contemporaneous employment of two consignees were allowed. Such no doubt might be the result, and when a case of that description arises we must deal with it, but we are not to presume fraud; and no fraud is alleged on the present occasion. I think, therefore, on the authority of Simond v. Hibert, and the practice of this Court, that Mr. Jones is entitled to priority in respect of so much of his debt as arose in and after April, 1866; and in regard to so much of his debt as arose between January and April to stand ratably with the petitioner as to any sum which the petitioner can prove to be due to the estate of Mr. Roberts for the advances beyond his receipts which he made during those three months; and if no sum be found due to the estate of Mr. Roberts on account of transactions during that time, then to priority for the whole of his debt.

The covenant in the mortgage deed was the personal covenant of the mortgagor, and there can be no doubt that it might have been enforced against him, and that previously to Mr. Roberts' bankruptcy Mr. Roberts might have restrained the mortgagor from making consignments to any other person, but the covenant did not bind the estate, did not prevent a stranger from acting as consignee, nor prejudice his rights, as against the estate, for the supplies which were necessary for the maintenance and upholding of the estate, and in my opinion it cannot affect the rights of Mr. Jones. Similar covenants are usual in mortgages of West Indian estates, but this Court has not allowed them to destroy the claims of consignees, unless fraud or special circumstances were established against the consignee. Therefore on neither ground urged by Mr. Archibald Smith can I refuse to give effect to Mr. Jones' claim.

With regard to the question as to the second mortgage upon the live stock I am clearly of opinion that it cannot be supported as against the prior mortgagee. The second mortgage was made nearly five years before the sale, and was a mortgage affecting forty head of cattle all then living and marked with a particular brand, and giving no right as against their progeny, nor as against any cattle substituted for them. No evidence is before us to show that any of the forty were living at the time of the sale, or were included in the ninety cattle sold with the estate; nor if there were, as each animal sold varied in value from the other, do I see any means by which it would be possible for this Court to apportion the purchase money. Irrespective, however, of this very serious difficulty in the way of the second mortgagee, I think that he has no equity against the first mortgagee. So long as any portion of the debt and costs due to the first mortgagee, or of the moneys properly expended by him in the maintenance and cultivation of the estate remains undischarged, a second mortgagee has no equity. His equity to marshal lies not against the prior mortgagee but against those who have title to the property left untouched when that mortgagee realised his mortgage security. So long as any part of the debt due to the first mortgagee remains unpaid the equity which allows marshalling in favour of a second mortgagee does not arise. It was not disputed before me that the petitioner held the estate as mortgagee, and not as heir to his deceased son. It is clear, I think, upon the evidence that he elected to take as mortgagee. It was his interest to hold under that title, and the cases quoted by Mr. Archibald Smith appear to establish that he was entitled to insist upon his right to make the election, and he has petitioned this Court as mortgagee. It is, therefore, my opinion that the petitioner is entitled to charge against the estate not only the mortgage debt, interest, and costs, but also all sums properly expended by him as the mortgagee in possession of a West Indian estate, and it must be referred to chambers, if the parties differ, to take the petitioner's accounts upon the footing of this declaration.

I shall therefore direct that, as between Mr. Jones and the petitioner, Mr. Jones be placed in priority on the schedule; and as between the petitioner and Mr. Paine, that the petitioner be placed in priority in respect of all sums due to him for principal, interest, and costs on his mortgage security, and for all sums properly disbursed by him for the cultivation and maintenance of the plantation whilst he was mortgagee in possession. If after taking the accounts and paying all the charges upon the schedule prior to the petitioner's debt, it shall appear that any balance of the purchase-money remains, I shall reserve liberty to Mr. Paine, should he be so advised, to again bring forward his claim. I now merely decide that the first mortgagee is entitled to priority over him in regard to all the sums in respect of which I direct him to be placed on the schedule.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. JOHN ARCHIBALD RUSSELL, Q.C., Judge of the Manchester County Court, has been appointed a magistrate for the county of Lancaster. Mr. Russell, who was born in 1816, was educated at the University of Glasgow, where he graduated B.A. in 1835, and LL.B. in 1851; he was called to the bar at Gray's-inn in November, 1841, and was appointed a Queen's Counsel in February, 1868, being soon afterwards elected a bencher of Gray's-inn. While practising at the bar, he was a member of the Northern Circuit, and was appointed Solicitor-General for the County Palatine of Durham in May, 1862. In May, 1865, he was nominated Recorder of Bolton, which office he held till March, 1869, when he was appointed to succeed the late Mr. Ovens as Judge of the Manchester County Court, when he also resigned the Solicitor-Generalship of Durham.

Mr. JAMES BRYCE, barrister-at-law, of the Northern Circuit, has been appointed Regius Professor of Civil Law in the University of Oxford, in succession to Sir Travers Twiss, Queen's Advocate, resigned, having held the professorship since 1860. Mr. Bryce was originally a scholar of Trinity College, Oxford. In 1861 he gained one of the Gaird prizes for Greek verse, his poem being entitled "The May Queen." In 1862 he graduated B.A. at Oriel College, of which institution he afterwards became a fellow, and in that year received the Chancellor's prize for the Latin essay. He also received the prize for the Arnold historical essay in 1863, the subject being "The Holy Roman Empire." Mr. Bryce was elected Vinerian Law Scholar in December, 1861, and Craven Scholar in 1862. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in June, 1867.

Mr. HENRY MEREDITH PLOWDEN, barrister-at-law, has been appointed by the Viceroy of India to officiate as Advocate and Legal Adviser to the Government of the Punjab; while Mr. H. S. Cunningham acts for Mr. Boulnois as Judge of the Chief Court at Lahore. Mr. Plowden was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in June, 1866.

Mr. JOHN LUSKEY COAD, solicitor, of Liskeard, Cornwall, has been appointed Deputy Coroner for the Liskeard District, and the appointment has been approved by the Lord Chancellor. Mr. Coad's certificate as a solicitor dates from Hilary Term, 1850.

Mr. JOHN PARKINSON FINCH, of Barnstaple, Devon, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Devon.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LAND TRANSFER BILL.

Sir,—In considering the Lord Chancellor's bill for conveyancing reform, it should be distinctly understood what it is that the public wants. Is it indefeasibility of title, or is it better security against secret conveyances, or is it simply increased facility of transfer? The whole profession, I think, will agree that it is the last of the three that is really wanted, and that the other two, although they might not be rejected, were they to be had for the asking, are looked upon really with great indifference.

I believe with you, Sir, that the remedy required is not to be found in the Lord Chancellor's bill, nor do I think myself that it will be found in any system of registration whatever, even though there be a "Master of Registry" to conduct the proceedings.

If I were myself the Lord Chancellor, with the weight of a powerful Government at my back, what I should propose, I think, would be something as follows:—

1st. I would compulsorily abolish all copyhold tenure.

2ndly. Without waiting for the Digest Commissioners, I would have prepared at once a code of conveyancing, or perhaps I should say of real property law.

3rdly. I would urge the use of precedents such as we see employed by the lawyers of other countries—notably perhaps the French—which are concise, if I mistake not, both because the language employed is terse and to the point, and because a well-arranged code of law supplies what would otherwise have to be expressed in the deed.

When we consider that long drafts lead to long copies—to long perusals—to long engrossments—to long abstracts of title—to long fees to counsel, and so on to long drafts again, we may easily see one reason at least why conveyancing is dear, and how it is to be cheapened. E. S.

THE TEMPLE CHURCH.

Sir,—Could the shade of Charles Lamb revisit the scenes of his earlier years and see the upheaving of the Temple Gardens, the gorgeous building which now replaces the simple hall where the Inner Templars were wont to dine, and the other changes which time and progress (have our teachers actually become infected with it?) have produced, I am afraid he would not have been content with the mild rebuke which he administered to those who had removed his favourite winged horse and the frescoes from the end of Old Paper-buildings. However, the requirements of the times may have rendered necessary the changes which are now going forward, although it may occur to unsophisticated observers that a portion of the enormous sum spent in the rebuilding of the Hall might not inappropriately have been disposed in providing chamber accommodation for the numbers of members unable to find a place to put their heads into. But a Vandal has been at work in the Temple Church, and let us have no mercy upon him. In that church, to which no more appropriate epithets could be applied than "simple, erect, austere, divine," are now to be seen, along the centre, a range of flimsy brass candelabras, totally out of character with all the rest of the building. They strike the eye the moment it is turned to the interior of the church, and to those who sit in the stalls they are peculiarly offensive, because they stare you in the face with their brazen impertinence. From the simple bronze candlesticks (perhaps not very handsome) which line the stalls the eye travels to these audacious monsters which rear their heads in defiance of all taste and decency. I wonder the effigies of those venerated Templars who lie under the Norman roof do not arise from the ground and hew them down with their massive swords. As ornaments for a new church, or perhaps for St. Alban's, they might have been well. Chandeliers of a somewhat similar character look not inelegant in the Middle Temple Hall; but it is a dining-hall. In the Temple Church, sombre and severe, they are simply offensive.

Who that saw the church of Notre Dame at Paris before its recent meretricious ornamentation has not deplored the loathsome Vandalism which has made it like a music-hall? In La Sainte Chapelle gorgeous decoration is in keeping with the place. Must the Temple Church be allowed to be defiled? From an uneducated body of men monstrosities of taste may be expected, but not from the governors of men of education and of educated tastes. It may be wrong to set up a standard of taste, and say that one thing is in good taste, the other in bad; but most educated persons are ready to admit its propriety, and surely the benchers of the Temples ought to be the last to set it at defiance.

Temple, April 20.

A BARRISTER.

ASSURANCE COMPANIES AND THEIR AMALGAMATIONS.

Sir,—Your correspondent "A Barrister" has again taken up his pen, and as the question raised is an important one and he seems still to differ from my views, I will venture to send a few observations in reply. I am sorry that he should begin by cavilling about words, which generally does not add strength to a case. When I said "is there any difference in the case of a policyholder who has not entered into any new contract" it is clear by the context that what I meant was no new contract other than such as may be assumed by the payment of premiums, which is the question and the only question between us. This is a question which affects all policyholders, and unless they succeed upon this they have not a leg to stand upon. The discussion of any other questions which depend upon particular facts and circumstances must be argued with reference to those facts and circumstances, and it would, therefore, be futile to discuss them. I will not then meddle with the cases where deeds of settlement contained powers of transfer, as in the case of Re Waterloo Assurance Company. He then proceeds to say that, admitting the payment of the premiums not to be a novation, the payment of a premium to another company by direction of the insurers, will not, as against the former company, prevent a lapse. He means by this, I presume, prevent a forfeiture of the policy. But here again he does not look at both sides of the case. If the time for payment arrived whilst there was an office open where the premium could be paid, a forfeiture would no doubt occur; but is "A Barrister" prepared to contend where the doors of an assurance office have been closed and no person appointed to receive the future premiums on its policies, or attend to the winding up of its business under the dissolution clause of the settlement, that any court would hold that a company, having broken its contract by closing its doors in this way, and preventing the doing of the very act complained of, can maintain that the policyholder has forfeited his contract by non-payment of premium? The effect surely could only be at most that the company, having broken its contract, must be liable in damages for such breach at that date, and, if your correspondent's view be correct, that anything founded on an ultra vires deed would be void, the money subsequently paid by the policyholder would be simply thrown away, except so far as it might be recoverable from the amalgamating company for money paid under a false representation, or from the directors who improperly induced the policyholder to pay the premiums to the other company. There can be no doubt that a company, whose deed contains a proper dissolution clause, can appoint another company to wind up its affairs: the impropriety is in transferring or selling its assets, amongst other things, the future premiums on its policies. But why is a policyholder to assume that the company had done more than it had power to do? The Lord Chancellor says on the appeal motion upon the winding up of the Family Endowment Society:—"In order to prove the acquiescence of a creditor to the change of his debtor, he must be assumed to have satisfied himself that the substitution could be legitimately made, an assumption in the largest degree improbable." If the appointment be merely an appointment of the amalgamating company as agent no question arises, but if it be more than this, and what the company had not any authority to do, then a fraud has been committed by the directors to mislead their policyholders, for which they might also be subject to an action or a suit by the policyholders. Your correspondent also makes some observations that every policyholder must have known what was doing. I can assure him as a matter of fact that at the time of the amalgamation of the Family Endowment Society I was in the active practice of my profession, and I was astounded when I read the circular intimating that the arrangement had taken place. Had I known of it whilst in progress, I would not have suffered a day to go by before a bill had been upon the file. If it were intended to interfere with my rights, why was not direct notice given to me of what was proposed to be done? I leave the inference to your correspondent. As to the case of King v. Accumulative Life Fund I think your correspondent is wrong as to the effect of it. The same thing was done in that case as in the case of the Family Endowment Society—arrangements had been made for the amalgamating company to receive future premiums.

Your correspondent still refers to the refusal of the company to accept the premium being a ground of action. I suppose he does mean to contend that the closing of the doors of the company is not such a refusal, and that it is necessary to hold a conversation with the door-posts. If the closing of the doors be a refusal, assuming that the case of King v. Accumulative Life Fund does not interfere with the right to bring an action until the debt becomes due, or the company having to pay refuses or becomes unable to pay, also assuming that the appointment of the company to receive the premiums was not a proper one, which would have been a different matter for him, the policyholder, to determine, he might have brought an action.

But now, let us come to the real point at issue, whether the mere payment of a premium to any office nominated by the amalgamated company is to imply, not only a new contract with the company to whom the premiums are paid, but an altered contract with the amalgamated company discharging it from its liability. This I believe to be a case of prævia impressionis, for no cases until save recently decided can be found to justify such an implication, the cases relating to ordinary partnerships having been held by the Lord Chancellor not to apply to a case of this sort. This being so, upon what principle of law or justice is such an assumption to be made? Where a person enters into an agreement without details, it perhaps may be implied that he assents to everything which is necessary for carrying it out; but what implication is there that he has assented to something not named in the contract, and which is not necessary to the carrying it out? As before observed, the contention of the contracting company is not only that the policyholder has entered into a new contract with the amalgamating company by making the payment of his future premiums to that company at the request of the contracting company, but that he has also agreed to release the contracting company from its liability to pay. Now, the arrangement made by the amalgamated company for paying the premiums to the amalgamating company and completing the whole transaction with that company can be easily carried out, leaving the amalgamated company liable to pay its own debts if not paid by the other company; and why is the Court to assume that the contract contains any such understanding where nothing was mentioned upon the subject by either party, and the party wishing to take advantage of the release has not stipulated as he might have done that he should be released? For, although the creditor was not a party to the deed, it might have been provided that the amalgamating company should not receive the premiums from the policyholder unless he consented to discharge the amalgamated company. The omission of such a stipulation leads to an inference directly contrary to its being part of the contract. But even assuming that a policyholder has knowledge of the whole of the contents of the deeds at the time, what is there even then from which it may be inferred in a deed to which he is not a party that it was intended that he should release his debtor? By the deed the debtor makes an arrangement with some other person to take his assets and liquidate his liabilities, and takes a covenant from him to indemnify him in case he should be called upon to pay any of those liabilities. Upon the face of this arrangement the inference is that the debtor was still to remain liable; otherwise why the indemnity? At all events there is nothing in such a covenant from which it is to be implied that the debtor is to be released by his creditor. Lord Justice Giffard says, "it was incumbent on those who desired that the old contract should be superseded by a new one to make proposals to that effect or take steps for that purpose, but they forbore or neglected to do so."

In the case of a lease, the lessee covenants with the lessor to perform the covenants, he assigns the lease and takes an indemnity from his assignee against the covenants; the lessor receives the rent and otherwise deals with the assignee as tenant, but this does not discharge the lessee from his covenants if unperformed by the assignee. In the case of a sale of an equity of redemption, the purchaser covenants to indemnify the vendor against his, the purchaser's, covenant to pay the mortgage money, the mortgagee receives the interest on his mortgage money from the purchaser, but he does not, therefore, release the purchaser (his mortgagor) from his covenant to pay the mortgage money if not paid by the vendor (the assignee).

In conclusion, I do not see why it should be unjust that shareholders under disability, or persons claiming the estate of deceased persons, should be called upon to meet their liabilities, in these cases more than in any other cases, which arise from the nature of the engagement into which the person under whom they claim entered into.

OBITUARY.

MR. ROBERT WILSON.

The death of Mr. Robert Wilson, senior member of the firm of Wilson, Bristowes, & Carpmael, of Copthall Buildings, Throgmorton-street, at the premature age of fifty-seven, demands special notice in the Solicitors' Journal. He was on many accounts a very distinguished ornament of the profession, and for some years, though too few, was a valuable and highly respected member of the council of the Law Institution. Independent in judgment and strong in his convictions, he was uniformly courteous and impartial, and endeared himself to those whose privilege it was to act with him by the happy combination of a clear and vigorous intellect with sincere respect for the opinions of others. His single aim seemed to be to find out the truth and to abide by it.

Mr. Wilson from an early period of his professional life advocated with great skill and ingenuity a system of land transfer, having for its disinterested object the reduction of expense connected with the transfer of land, and the simplification of titles. He was a very laborious and valuable member of the Royal Commission of 1853, on the registration of titles, and though he was not able conscientiously to concur in the report of that Commission, he rendered important service to it, and his colleagues, among whom were Mr. Spencer Walpole, Sir Joseph Napier, late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Lord Westbury, then Attorney-General, and Mr. Lowe, now Chancellor of the Exchequer, in recognition of their obligations to him, concluded their report of 1857 with the following tribute:—

"We are reluctant to conclude this report without expressing our regret that it has not received the concurrence of one of the commissioners who is known to have given much attention to the subject of registration, and who has embodied his opinions in a plan, to which we have already referred. While, however, we acknowledge that our report would have derived additional authority had he felt himself at liberty to affix his name to it, we have the satisfaction, not only of knowing that we have not failed carefully to examine the proposals which he has laid before us, though unable in the result to adopt them, but also that we have had the aid of his deliberations and suggestions in maturing our views and recommendations, even where they differ from his own."

MR. S. EVANS.

The death of Mr. Samuel Evans, solicitor, of Newtown, Montgomeryshire, took place on the 11th of April, after a long illness. The late Mr. Evans, who was in his sixty-third year, took out his attorney's certificate in Trinity Term, 1843.

MR. C. S. HOGG.

The late Mr. Charles Swinton Hogg, barrister-at-law, and Administrator-General of Bengal, who died at Calcutta on the 16th March, was the second son of Sir James Weir Hogg, Bart. (who was registrar of the Supreme Court of Calcutta previous to 1833, and is now a member of the Indian Council), by the second daughter of Samuel Swinton, Esq., of the Bengal Civil Service. Mr. C. S. Hogg was born in 1824, and was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in May, 1849; he was formerly a member of the Home Circuit, and practised at the Kent Sessions. He afterwards proceeded to Calcutta, and received the lucrative appointment of Administrator-General, and was also Official Trustee to the High Court of Bengal.

MR. F. J. WISE.

Mr. Frederick James Wise, solicitor, of March, Cambridgeshire, expired at that place on the 9th April, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. The deceased gentleman, who was the senior partner in the local firm of Wise & Dawbarn, took out his certificate as a solicitor in Hilary Term, 1841, and was a member of the Incorporated Law Society.

MR. R. WHALL.

Mr. Robert Whall, solicitor, of Chesterfield, Derbyshire, died suddenly in his office, while transacting some legal business, on the 9th of April. Mr. Whall, who was in his fifty-fourth year, was certificated in Hilary Term, 1840, and carried on business both at Chesterfield and Dronfield. He was formerly in partnership with Mr. E. L. Darwin.

MR. J. E. POWLES.

The death of Mr. John Endell Powles, solicitor, of Monmouth, took place at his residence (Castle Villa) in that town on the 7th April, at the age of fifty-eight years. The late Mr. Powles was certificated as a solicitor in Easter Term, 1843, and was in partnership with the late Mr. Alfred Evans, whose death was recently announced. He held the position of alderman of Monmouth for nearly sixteen years, and filled the office of mayor of that borough for three successive years—namely, from 1852 to 1854. Mr. Alderman Powles was a member of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association.

MR. ADAM RIVERS STEELE.

Mr. A. R. Steele, of Gray's-inn, barrister-at-law, died recently at his residence at Cricklewood, Middlesex. Until a very few years preceding the date of his death Mr. Steele had practised in the other branch of the profession. Mr. Steele was articled to the late Mr. Alderman Harmer in the year 1832, and on his being admitted an attorney in 1837, joined that gentleman in business under the style of Harmer & Steele, but in 1842 Alderman Harmer retired from business, and Mr. Steele from that time practised alone, being afterwards joined by two of his sons. In 1866 he retired from the solicitor's branch of the profession, and was called to the bar at Gray's inn, last year. Mr. Steele had no intention of regularly practising as a barrister; he appeared, however, in a few cases in which his own firm had been concerned, and which from having himself commenced he felt an interest in working out to the end. He had appeared in one of these cases (Secretary of State v. Underwood) on appeal in the House of Lords only a few weeks before his death. Mr. Steele was much respected in the profession, and will long be remembered by many as the generally successful defender of many celebrated actions for libel against the Weekly Dispatch, the Sun, and other of Mr. Harmer's papers, in which the plaintiffs were public characters or titled persons.

At a recent meeting of the St. George's, Hanover-square, Ratepayers' Defence Association, Dr. Appleton said it was scarcely necessary to point out the desirability of the clerk to the magistrates in petty sessions being a gentleman of legal experience. The clerks to the police magistrates were invariably lawyers, and if the necessity exists in a court where the magistrates were gentlemen of experience, it was doubly essential in the case of the magistrates who sit in Mount-street, the majority of whom knew nothing whatever of legal matters. It was also the custom in other districts to employ a legal gentleman in that capacity, and he could not conceive why an important parish like St. George's, Hanover-square, should be treated in a different manner to the rest of the metropolis. The emoluments derived from the office were ample to induce a gentleman of experience to accept it, which he felt quite satisfied would bring about a very beneficial change. After some further remarks it was resolved that the secretary be instructed to write to the clerk of the Middlesex magistrates, expressing a hope, on the part of the association, that when a successor is appointed to Mr. Chappell, they will give the parishioners the advantage of a clerk who has had a legal education.—Courier.

PRIVY COUNCIL.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

For the establishment of certain Rules to be observed by Proctors, Solicitors, Agents, and other Persons admitted to practise before her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.

At the Court at Windsor, the 31st day of March, 1870.
Present: The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas there was this day read at the Board a representation from the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, dated the 26th day of March instant, humbly recommending to her Majesty in Council that certain rules be established by the authority of her Majesty, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, to be observed by all proctors, solicitors, attorneys, agents, or other persons employed in the conduct of appeals, petitions, or other matters pending before her Majesty in Council, her Majesty having taken the said representation into consideration, and the schedule of rules hereunto annexed, was pleased by and with the advice of her Privy Council, to approve thereof, and to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the same be punctually observed, obeyed, and carried into execution.

ARTHUR HELPS.

SCHEDULE ANNEXED TO THE FOREGOING ORDER.

I. Every proctor, solicitor, or agent, admitted to practise before her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, or any of the Committees thereof, shall subscribe a declaration to be enrolled in the Privy Council Office, engaging to observe and obey the rules, regulations, orders, and practice of the Privy Council; and also to pay and discharge, from time to time, when the same shall be demanded, all fees or charges due and payable upon any matter pending before her Majesty in Council; and no person shall be admitted to practise, or allowed to continue to practise, before the Privy Council, without having subscribed such declaration in the following terms:—

FORM OF DECLARATION.

We, the undersigned, do hereby declare, that we desire and intend to practise as solicitors or agents in appeals and other matters pending before her Majesty in Council; and we severally and respectively do hereby engage to observe, submit to, perform, and abide by all and every the orders, rules, regulations, and practise of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council and the Committees thereof now in force, or hereafter from time to time to be made; and also to pay and discharge, from time to time, when the same shall be demanded, all fees, charges, and sums of money due and payable in respect of any appeal, petition, or other matter in and upon which we shall severally and respectively appear as such solicitors or agents.

II. Every proctor, solicitor or attorney practising in London, and duly admitted in any of the Courts of Westminster, shall be allowed to subscribe the foregoing declaration, and to practise in the Privy Council, upon the production of his certificate for the current year; and no fee shall be payable by him on the enrolment of his signature to the foregoing declaration.

III. Persons not being certificated London solicitors, but having been duly admitted to practise as solicitors by the High Courts of Judicature in India or in the colonies respectively, may apply, by petition, to the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for leave to be admitted to practise in the Privy Council; and such persons, if admitted to practise by an order of their Lordships, shall pay annually, on the 15th of November, a fee of five guineas to the fee fund of the Council Office.

IV. Any proctor, solicitor, or agent or other person practising before the Privy Council, who shall wilfully act in violation of the rules and practice of the Privy Council, or of any rules prescribed by the authority of her Majesty, or of the Lords of the Council, or who shall wilfully misconduct himself in prosecuting proceedings before the Privy Council, or any Committee thereof, or who shall refuse or omit to pay the Council Office fees or charges payable from him when demanded, shall be liable to an absolute or temporary prohibition to practise before the Privy Council, by the authority of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, upon cause shown at their Lordships' Bar.

THE REAL ESTATES INTESTACY BILL.*

I presume that the "Real Estates Intestacy Bill" was intended for no other purpose than to take the opinion of the House of Commons on the principle which it involves. I can hardly suppose that it was seriously thought sufficient, if passed into law in its present shape, to accomplish satisfactorily the purpose proposed. And as an amendment of the law on this subject is now promised by her Majesty's speech at the opening of Parliament, I shall confine my remarks to the general principle which the bill in question is understood to involve. The question which I now propose to discuss is whether and how the disposition which the law now makes of the real estate of an intestate may be beneficially altered.

Before endeavouring to amend the law, it seems desirable that we should first clearly comprehend it. I will therefore attempt in the first place very briefly to state what the present law on this subject is, trusting that those of my hearers who are professionally acquainted with its details will forgive me for the sake of those who are not.

An estate in fee simple in lands or tenements descends on the decease of its owner to his eldest son, subject to any disposition to the contrary which he may have made by his will, and subject also to the dower of his widow, if any; unless he should, as he may, by deed or will, have deprived her of this right. The widow's dower is an estate for her life in one equal third part in value of the lands, set out for her after her husband's decease.

The full power of testamentary disposition which is now possessed is no doubt liable to abuse. But the balance of advantages appears to me to incline so strongly in its favour, that I trust the example of some foreign nations will not induce any attempt to infringe upon it. A man no doubt has now the power to leave his property away from his children without just cause; but the cases in which this occurs are most rare, compared with those in which the power is beneficially exercised to meet the peculiar exigencies of the family—exigencies which no legislative foresight can possibly adjust.

The fee simple lands of a married woman descend, on her decease, to her eldest son, subject to the curtesy of her husband, and she has no power of testamentary disposition, unless the same should be, as it may be, specially conferred upon her by the instrument under which she claims. The husband's curtesy is an estate for his life in the whole of the lands of his wife to which he becomes entitled on having issue by her born alive who may inherit her lands.

The personal estate of a married woman belongs, on her decease, to her husband only. The personal estate of a married man who dies intestate belongs, one-third to his widow and two-thirds to his children equally; each child, however, accounting for any advancement which he may have had from his father in his lifetime. If there be no child, the widow takes half, and the other half is distributed amongst the next of kin, those of the half blood to the intestate sharing equally with those of the whole blood.

The descent of land and tenements to the eldest son is subject to some exceptions. By the custom of gavelkind, which prevails in a great part of the county of Kent, and which also affects the copyhold lands holden of certain manors in other parts of the country, the lands are equally divided amongst all the sons, every son being, as Littleton says, as great a gentleman as the eldest. The widow's dower of gavelkind lands is one-half, and not one-third, but it continues only during her widowhood. By the custom of borough English, which prevails in some boroughs and manors, lands descend to the youngest son only. It appears to me that there is no excuse for these anomalies, and that, whatever the law of descent may be, it should not be broken in upon by such local peculiarities.

But there is another important exception to the rule of primogeniture to which I wish to call your attention, because it has been of modern growth, and has never, so far as I am aware, been thought to be otherwise than beneficial in its results. If two or more members of a trading partnership require lands or tenements for the purposes of their partnership, the share of each partner will not, on his decease intestate, belong to his eldest son as his heir-at-law; but it will be considered in equity as personal estate, and it will be sold, and the money divided amongst his widow and all his children in the shares already mentioned. If, however, the intestate should have outlived his partners, or should never have had a partner, the lands and tenements acquired for the purposes of his trade will, with the rest of his real estate, descend exclusively to his eldest son. So that if two men are in partnership, the question whether the share of either will devolve, on his decease intestate, on his heir or his next of kin, depends upon whether he dies after or before the other.

Again, the descent of lands to the eldest son may be prevented by a device, not unfrequently adopted, of vesting them in trustees in trust to sell, even though the trust be to sell with the consent of a person whose consent may, in all probability, be withheld. Equity considers as done that which is agreed or directed to be done. The land, though unsold, is looked upon in equity as money; and, on the decease intestate of any person entitled to a share, the same will belong, not to his heir-at-law, but to his next of kin, in the same manner as if it were money, the result of a sale actually made. But in order to effect this object, a direction must be given for sale; it will not be sufficient for the settlor merely to declare that he wishes the lands to be considered in equity as personal and not as real estate.

Before the abolition of feudal tenures, which took place at the restoration of King Charles II., freehold lands, held by knights' service, descended to the heir-at-law, subject to a power in the ancestor of testamentary disposition over two-thirds only, although he might dispose of the whole in his lifetime by proper means of conveyance. There were other feudal burdens also to which such lands were subject. In order to escape from these burdens and to acquire a full power of testamentary disposition, irrespective of the rights of the heir, a practice became usual in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I., for purchasers of lands to obtain a demise of them for a long term of years, generally one or two thousand, at the nominal rent of a penny or a peppercorn, without impeachment of waste, with or without a covenant for the conveyance, whenever required, of the ultimate reversion in fee-simple. Many lands are now held under such titles. On the decease, intestate, of the owner of lands held only for a term of years, the lands do not descend to the heir-at-law, but belong to the next of kin in the same manner as personal estate. Lands so held, therefore, do not go to the eldest son subject to the widow's dower, but devolve one-third to the widow and the remaining two-thirds to all the children equally, subject to their accounting for advancements made to them by their parent in his lifetime. Such lands are, however, subject to an administration duty, from which freehold lands escape.

On the other hand there are some kinds of personal estate which may be made to descend, on intestacy, to the heir-at-law. A personal annuity may be limited to a man and his heirs. An estate held for the life of another person may be given to a man and his heirs, in which case the heir will, on his decease intestate, come in as a special occupant. And a trust to lay out money in the purchase of lands will in equity convert it into real estate, and cause it to descend to the heir of the beneficiary, instead of devolving on his next of kin.

But an estate in fee simple is not the only estate in lands which descends to the eldest son as heir-at-law. There may be an estate in tail general or special. An estate in tail general descends to all the issue of the donee in due course, the sons and their respective issue first taking in order of seniority, and then the daughters and their respective issue taking in equal shares, the issue standing in the place of their ancestor. An estate in tail special may be confined to the issue of a particular marriage, or may be in tail male or tail female. An estate in tail male cannot go to a daughter, nor an estate in tail female to a son. An estate in fee simple descends, as we have seen, subject to a power of testamentary disposition vested in the ancestor. There is no such power over any estate tail; it will descend to the heir, whatever the will of his ancestor may be. But the expectation of the heir may be defeated by a proper assurance, executed by the ancestor in his lifetime, and enrolled in the Court of Chancery. Estates in tail female are scarcely ever seen. Estates in tail and in tail male are created for the express purpose of causing the lands to descend to the eldest son in preference to the other children.

But the most usual way in which the eldest son succeeds to the family estate is not in his character of heir at all, but as a person on whom the lands are expressly settled by the description of the first or eldest son of his father; the father having limited himself to an estate for his life only, and having settled the reversion on his sons successively. A settlement of this kind cannot be made beyond one generation of unborn children. But a desire to retain the estate in the line of the eldest male usually occasions a re-settlement on the majority or marriage of the eldest son.

I do not think that the power of settling landed or other property on the eldest, or any other son, limited as it now is, should be substantially interfered with; although in some of the technical details of contingent remainders, as they are called, a reform is much needed. Nor do I think that the present law with regard to estates tail needs any material alteration. If successive generations having the power to choose any line of succession they please, all deliberately prefer one line to another, whether that line be the eldest male to the exclusion of all females, or females to the exclusion of all males, I do not see why they should not be allowed to follow their own choice. It must be remembered that personal property may be tied up by settlement almost exactly to the same extent as real estate. The fundholder may accumulate his millions exclusively on his eldest son. If no relation in this respect is suggested with regard to personal property, none surely should be made with respect to real estate.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

SITTINGS IN ERROR.

The following days have been appointed for the argument of Errors and Appeals:—

QUEEN'S BENCH.

Friday May 13 | Saturday May 14

COMMON PLEAS.

Monday May 16 | Tuesday May 17

EXCHEQUER.

Wednesday May 18 | Thursday May 19

Mr. Patrick Grant, Writer to the Signet in Scotland, and Sheriff-Clerk of Invernesshire, died in Upper Berkeley-street, London, on the 18th April, aged sixty-five.

The coronership of West Berks has become vacant by the death of Dr. John Alexander, which took place at Newbury on the 12th April. The duties of the office have for some time been performed by his son-in-law, Mr. W. J. Cowper, solicitor, who has been deputy coroner for some years, and it is likely that he will be elected without opposition.

YANKEE NEWS.

A Pittsburg judge recently fined a young man fifty dollars for kissing a lady in the street.

A Tennessee jury has thought it worth ten dols. to call a man unjustly a Kuklux in that state.

The Junior Law Class of Washington University numbers among its members two females.

The law expenses of the United States Government during the past year amounted to 375,990 dols.

A Tennessee court is listening to 300 love letters which are being read in a breach of promise case.

The United States Supreme Court have decided, that the late war between North and South ended August 17, 1866, the date of President Johnson's proclamation to that effect.

The Pennsylvania Legislature has been petitioned by the Philadelphia bar to increase the judiciary, both local and State. —Albany Law Journal.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

After the interval devoted to the holidays all the markets reopened with a considerable impetus, and have continued so. Railways, indeed, have fallen back a trifle in price during the last two days, but this is attributable merely to the sales made by speculators who have now been realising their profits. The Indian Guaranteed Stocks are rather more in request than of late, while in Americans the Eries have receded a little, in consequence of the ill auguries drawn from the fact that the supporters of Fisk and Gould have been re-elected to municipal offices in New York.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—The next meeting will be held on Wednesday, the 4th of May, 1870, at eight p.m., precisely, when Sir George Young, Bart., will read a paper on "The proper Object and Constitution of a Legal University or Council of Legal Education." The Hon. Mr. Justice Hannen will preside. The Council will meet at half-past seven.

The University of Edinburgh has conferred the degree of LL.D. on Mr. Justice Blackburn.

Mr. Thomas Kirkpatrick, Q.C., of the Canadian Bar, died at Kingston, Ontario, on the 26th March, aged sixty-five years.

At the Berks Easter Sessions a motion was carried for paying the magistrates' clerks by salary, instead of by fees. The loss to the county by the new arrangement would not be more than £80 per annum.

Mr. Henry Watson, solicitor, of Aylesbury, having resigned the clerkship of the local Board of Health, which he had held for a period of twenty years, has been presented by the members of the board with a handsome clock, as a mark of the regard and esteem in which he is held by that body.

Mr. W. J. Cowper, solicitor, of Newbury, is a candidate for the vacant Coronership of East Berks. He has acted as Deputy-Coroner for the last seventeen years, and has performed most of the duties of Coroner for about three years past, owing to Dr. Alexander's illness. Mr. J. Cockburn Pinniger, another solicitor, of Newbury, and Clerk to the Guardians of Bradfield Union, is also a candidate for the Coronership.

Wimbledon.—Freehold Family Residence, in a choice position, with charming gardens and lawn, occupying half an acre, with possession.

MR. PHILIP D. TUCKETT will SELL by AUCTION, at the MART, Tokenhouse-yard, E.C., on TUESDAY, MAY 10, at TWELVE, a very superior detached FREEHOLD FAMILY RESIDENCE, pleasantly placed on rising ground, in one of the most favourite localities near town, known as No. 12, Lansdowne-road, Wimbledon, very near to the common, and about a mile from the railway station, whence there are direct trains to all the southern terminal stations. It contains dining and drawing rooms, and library on the ground floor, 11 bedrooms, excellent offices, and stabling, and stands in well-arranged flower and kitchen gardens, croquet lawn, &c., with pleasant open field behind. It was built for and is occupied by the owner, who is going abroad, and early possession can be had.

Particulars and conditions of Messrs. PARK & W. B. NELSON, solicitors, 11, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.; on the premises; or, with orders to view, of MR. PHILIP D. TUCKETT, land agent, surveyor, &c., 10a, Old Broad-street, E.C.

Monmouthshire, one mile from the increasingly prosperous town and port of Newport, 4½ hours from London by express.—The Malindee-park Estate, a most desirable freehold residential property, free from land-tax, with an elegant and commodious stone-built mansion, extensive stabling, excellent farm homestead, large kitchen garden, vine-ries, forcing-pits, orchard, picturesque pleasure grounds, park-like lands, neat entrance-lodge, &c., the whole comprising about 135 acres, in a ring fence, and forming one of the most attractive residential properties of its extent in the kingdom. First-rate salmon and trout fishing may be had in the celebrated river Usk, and three packs of hounds meet frequently within easy distances.

MR. W. A. BOWLER (in conjunction with Messrs. W. GRAHAM & SON, of Newport) is favoured with instructions from the trustees under the will of the late James Rennie, Esq., to offer the above very valuable FREEHOLD RESIDENTIAL PROPERTY for SALE by AUCTION, at the KING'S HEAD HOTEL, in the town of Newport, on WEDNESDAY, the 1st day of JUNE, 1870, at TWO for THREE o'clock in the afternoon precisely, in One Lot. Possession of the mansion and about 24 acres of land may be had on completion of the purchase, and of the farm and residue of the land at Candlemas, 1871.

Particulars and conditions of sale, with plan of the estate and plans and views of the mansion and lodge, may be had (price 5s. each) at the Auction Mart, Tokenhouse-yard, London; at the office of the Midland Counties Herald, Birmingham; or Messrs. PROTHERO & FOX, Solicitors, Newport; of Messrs. WM. GRAHAM & SON, Land Agents, Valuers, and Auctioneers, Savings' Bank-chambers, Newport; and of Mr. W. A. BOWLER, Land and Timber Surveyor and Valuer, Estate Agent, and Auctioneer, 7, Whitehall-place, London, S.W.

Queen Victoria-street. Mansion-house.—To Bankers, Financial Associations, Chambers of Commerce, Public Corporations and Companies.—Plots of Building Land, probably the most important in the city of London ever submitted to public competition.

MESSRS. FOSTER are directed by the Metropolitan Board of Works to LET by Public AUCTION (on building leases for terms of 80 years), at the AUCTION MART, Tokenhouse-yard, Lothbury, near the Bank of England, on TUESDAY, the 26th APRIL, at ONE for TWO o'clock precisely, the following PLOTS in Queen Victoria-street, the new grand thoroughfare from the Poultry to Cannon-street, and, in the course of the ensuing summer, from thence onward by the Thames Embankment to Westminster-bridge, viz.:

Lot 1. The Plot on the north-east corner of Queen Victoria-street and the Poultry, with frontages to each, amounting together to about 150ft., and containing a superficial area of about 2,352ft. There are two houses on this plot, at present in the occupation of Mr. Goode, tobacconist, and Mr. Brown, tailor, who are both under agreements to quit at a month's notice. This site, from its matchless position, being at the angle of the new street and the Poultry, where the vast traffic to and from the city culminates, is of the greatest importance, and commands itself to the attention of public companies and banking establishments.

Lot 2. The Plot adjoining the preceding westward, with a frontage to the Poultry and another frontage to the new street. The portion next the Poultry is in the occupation of Messrs. Wheeler & Co., shirt makers, and is subject to a lease (6½ years), but possession of the portion of the plot facing the new street can be had immediately.

Lot 3. The Plot on the south side of the street, near the Mansion-house, having a superficial area of about 6,296 ft., with a frontage to the new street of nearly 105 ft., a frontage to Charlotte-row of nearly 95 ft., a frontage to Bucklersbury of about 86 ft. 6, and a circular frontage to the Poultry of about 20 ft. The value and importance of this site, occupying so large an area in the most attractive and desirable spot in all the city of London, can hardly be over estimated. It presents, from its great extent and unrivalled position, probably the finest site in the whole city for a grand edifice in connection with any important financial or other association.

Particulars, with plans and conditions of letting, will shortly be published, and then had at the Auction Mart; or of Messrs. FOSTER, 34, Pall-mall, who will, on written application, forward copies free by post.

The Subscription to the SOLICITORS' JOURNAL is—Twelve, 26s., Country 28s.; with the WEEKLY REPORTER, 52s. Payment in advance includes Double Numbers and Postage. Subscribers can have their Volumes bound at the Office—cloth, 2s. 6d.; half law calf, 4s. 6d.

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, APRIL 30, 1870.

VICE CHANCELLOR JAMES gave judgment yesterday in Wood v. Chart, a case which has excited the greater attention from its being the first under the International Copyright Act, 1852 (15 Vict. c. 12), at least so far as that statute relates to dramatic compositions. The provisions of the Act, so far as they came in question in this case, are substantially these—the authors of foreign plays (i.e., plays first performed abroad) may prevent their representation in the British dominions of any unauthorised translation, for a period not exceeding four years from the first publication or representation of an authorised translation, but nothing in the Act contained is to prevent "fair imitations or adaptations to the English stage" of a foreign play. To obtain the benefit of the Act the following requisitions must be complied with: (1.) the original play must be registered, and a copy deposited in the United Kingdom within three months of publication; (2.) the author must notify on the title-page his intention to reserve the right of translation; (3.) a translation sanctioned by the author must be published within three months of the registration of the original work; (4.) such translation must be registered.

Such being the law, the following are the facts:—"Frou-frou," a French comedy, was registered in England; an English version was made, published, and registered. Mr. Wood, the plaintiff, became assignee of all English rights both of the authors and translators. An unauthorised version was made and publicly acted by the defendants. Thereupon the plaintiff filed his bill for an injunction and an account. It must now be noticed that the authorised English version of the plaintiff was entitled "Like to Like," the scene transferred to England, the names of the characters changed to English names, and certain alterations and omissions made in the dialogue, but the plot and the main incidents continued the same. The Vice-Chancellor dismissed the bill, holding that the requisitions to entitle the plaintiff to the benefit of the Act had not been complied with, for "Like for Like" was not a "translation" within the meaning of the Act, but rather "an imitation or adaptation to the English stage." The proper course, the Vice-Chancellor said, would have been to publish an authorised translation of the whole work. This translation need not have been acted, but any alteration or adaptation of it might have been represented by the plaintiff or his licensees. Had the plaintiff done this, and then come into court, the Vice-Chancellor affirmed that he would have restrained the defendants' version as a piratical translation.

THE NATURALIZATION BILL passed through Committee in the House of Commons on Monday night, with but little discussion on the clauses. Three alterations have been made by the Committee. First, on the motion of Sir C. Dilke, endorsed by the Solicitor-General, the clause was omitted which empowered the Government to suspend the provisions of the bill so far as it relates to property held by aliens in the time of war. Secondly, a proviso was added to clause 4, to the effect that a person born abroad of a British father, may, if of full age, and not under disability, make a declaration of allegiance, and shall thereupon cease to be a British subject. Thirdly, the time during which an alien must reside in this country before becoming entitled to a certificate of naturalization was increased from three to five years. A formidable alteration was proposed, on the report, by Mr. Vernon Harcourt, who wished to enact, in effect, that persons born within the dominions of her Majesty of alien fathers shall not be British subjects unless naturalized, and that persons born abroad, whose fathers are British subjects, shall not be natural-born British subjects when their fathers have never resided within the dominions of her Majesty. These proposals were met by Sir Roundell Palmer with the objections that, however sound they might be in theory, to attempt to apply them in practice would land us in difficulties of a most alarming nature; and that to adopt them would be to introduce an element of difficulty and contention into the very relations with the United States which it was the object of the convention to adjust. The Solicitor-General, on behalf of the Government, refusing to accept the amendment, it was negatived without a division. The bill as it stands will be read a third time next week, and will then be sent back to the Lords. They will hardly disagree with the few amendments of the Commons.

THE NEW HALL of the Inner Temple is to be opened by H. R. H. the Princess Louise, accompanied by Prince Christian, on Saturday, May 14, when a déjeuner will be given in the new building at one o'clock. There is also to be a banquet in the hall on the following Wednesday (May 18), at half past 5 p.m. The sub-treasurer has issued a notice to members of the inn, stating that as many places as possible will on each occasion be reserved for barristers and students of the inn; those who wish to be present on either occasion are requested to send their applications to the sub-treasurer on or before Wednesday (May 4), stating for which of the two days an admission ticket is desired. The allotment of tickets is to be made according to seniority, and notified immediately afterwards, and it is to be understood that as the accommodation in the hall is limited, no barrister or student can be present on both occasions.

THE SUBJECT OF COMPENSATION FOR RAILWAY ACCIDENTS, to which we have recently referred on several occasions, has now been brought before Parliament, and a motion by Mr. C. Denison for a committee of the House to investigate the subject has been carried. We were glad, however, to observe that an amendment proposed by Mr. Hinde Palmer, Q.C., was also carried, and that the committee will consider not only what ought to be done, if anything, to relieve the railway companies from the hardships of which they complain, but also whether something further cannot be done to render railway accidents less frequent. The whole subject is certainly a very fit one to be investigated by a Parliamentary committee; we fear, however, that the case of the railway companies is likely to be brought much more effectively before the committee than the case of the public. Of course the railway directors will take care that all the evidence that can be given on their side of the question comes before the committee; while, on the other hand, the case of railway passengers will be left to be protected by the voluntary exertions of members of the committee unprompted by any individual or particular interest. The proceedings of the committee will therefore require careful watching. One of the first things which the committee should do, as it seems to us, is to ask for a return of the amount paid for compensation for a certain number of years, as well from the railway companies which have been fortunate as from those which have been unfortunate. When these amounts were obtained and compared with the gross receipts for passenger fares during the same period, it would probably appear that, taking all the companies together, there would be little ground for saying that the amount of the fares had not been sufficient reasonably to cover the risk to be incurred. Even, however, if, upon this comparison, it turned out that the amount paid as compensation was large in proportion to the total fares, this would not of itself prove the case of the companies, because a considerable number of the accidents might no doubt have been avoided by good management, and as to these there can be no reason at all why full compensation should not be made. The only cases where there is any ground for limiting the compensation are where the accidents, although caused by negligence of the companies' servants, are yet such as must, owing to the nature of the traffic and to human fallibility, occasionally happen with the best management that can reasonably be called for. Of course it will be impossible to ascertain accurately the amount which has been paid by the companies as compensation for accidents coming within this category, but a fair estimate can be made by deducting from the total compensation paid by any particular company that paid in respect of particular accidents notoriously attributable to bad management. We notice that Mr. Denison adduced as an argument in support of his motion the great disproportion between the profit which would have been made by the Brighton Company by the safe carriage of the passengers in the New Cross accident and the actual amount of compensation which they had to pay owing to their not having carried them safely. This, however, goes no further to show that fares generally do not cover the risk than the death of a person within the first year after he had insured his life, after the payment of one premium only, would show that the office did not charge sufficiently high premiums fairly to cover their risk.

THE APPLICATION IN THE CASE OF Dr. Kinglake, which we anticipated would be made (ante p. 447), came before the Court of Queen's Bench last week, when Sir John Karlake moved, on behalf of the defendant, for a new trial, on the ground that Mr. Justice Hannen had improperly disallowed the privilege of silence claimed by the witness Lovibond. Lovibond, our readers may remember, took two objections to being compelled to answer: first, he alleged that his answers would tend to expose him to a criminal prosecution, and, secondly, that they would be evidence against him in actions for penalties under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102 (the Corrupt Practices Act, 1854), now actually pending against him. On the first head, his objection was removed by a free pardon being presented to him for all offences of which he might have been guilty at the election of 1868. There still remained, however, the pending actions for penalties upon which the pardon could have no effect whatever. Did these entitle the witness to protection? The judge decided that they did not, upon the ground that the "penalties" recoverable were really nothing more than civil debts, and he added that he was fortified in his opinion by the circumstance that in the actions themselves in which Lovibond was defendant, he was, under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 35, competent and compellable as a witness. Sir John Karlake strongly urged on the Court that this circumstance did not abridge Lovibond's privilege in any proceeding other than the action itself, and pointed out the practical hardship which might result from a contrary interpretation of the section. But neither upon this point nor upon the more general question whether a mere action for pecuniary penalties is sufficient to entitle a witness to refuse to answer, did the learned judges pronounce any very definite or decided opinion. The Chief Justice appeared to think the well-known rule as to the liability to a "penalty or forfeiture" being a ground of protection did not apply to a penalty recoverable by civil process. Mr. Justice Blackburn considered that the matter would have been doubtful had it not been for 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 35, which, in his judgment, took away the reason for the existence of the privilege altogether. It became unnecessary, however, to decide these somewhat difficult questions, inasmuch as all the judges (Cockburn, C.J., Blackburn, Mellor, and Hannen, JJ.) were agreed in thinking that the evidence, having once been admitted, was evidence of which the defendant had no right to complain, and that they could not review, at his instance, the judge's decision. It must, therefore, be taken to be the law that if the judge at nisi prius overrules, even though improperly, a witness's privilege, his discretion is absolute so far, at all events, as the parties to the proceeding are concerned. The case would, of course, be different if the privilege were improperly allowed, as then the party who desired the evidence to be given would suffer an injury of which he would have a right to complain. The distinction between the improper admission and improper rejection of the evidence where the witness claims his privilege is very clearly laid down by some of the judges in Doe v. Egrement v. Dote (3 Q. B. 631), where Lord Denman, C.J., expresses a strong opinion that in both cases the Court ought to grant a new trial if the judge at nisi prius goes wrong. That opinion, on which Sir John Karlake chiefly relied, may now be considered as definitely overruled, so far as it has reference to the improper admission of evidence. The consequence will probably be to retrench within the narrowest limits, the allowance of claims of privilege for the future. For it is always desirable to admit evidence relevant to the issue, if possible, rather than exclude it; and with that view judges may be perhaps inclined to disallow claims of privilege rather more freely than heretofore, especially when they know that in taking that course there is no possibility of their decision being afterwards reversed.

A GOOD SPECIMEN of the result of careless legislation came before the Court of Queen's Bench last week in Bowden v. Allen, when the blunders in the Newspapers, &c., Repeal Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 24), became apparent. That statute repeals various enactments of George 3, restraining public meetings, lectures, &c., and so far was a beneficial Act, but it also repeals parts of more modern statutes, and amongst them some portions of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76. Amongst the repealed sections of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, are sections 6, 8, and 13, by which declarations are to be delivered to the Commissioners of Stamps, containing the names, abodes, &c., of the printers, publishers, and proprietors, of every newspaper, &c., signed by such printers, publishers, &c., and describing the printing-house, house of publication, and title of the paper. A copy of these declarations is made conclusive evidence against the persons signing it, of all the matters therein stated; a copy of every paper published has also to be delivered to the Commissioners of Stamps, and the production of a copy of the declaration and of a newspaper bearing the same title as the paper mentioned in the declaration is made sufficient proof of the publication of the paper by the persons signing the declaration. Section 19 also compels any one to answer a bill of discovery filed to assist an action of libel by discovering the printers, publishers, or proprietors, of a newspaper; and the section further provides that such discovery shall not be made use of as evidence or otherwise in any proceeding against the defendant, save only in that proceeding for which the discovery is made.

The Newspapers, &c., Repeal Act, 1869, has repealed these sections, and consequently the old difficulty of proving the publication of a libel in a newspaper provided for by sections 6, 8, and 13, is revived. Section 19, it is true, is re-enacted in the repealing Act, but it only meets this difficulty by giving a remedy in equity, (necessarily causing delay and expense) in aid of the common law process.

In noticing the Newspapers, &c., Repeal Act, 1869, in the Legislation of the Year (13 S. J., 919), we pointed out this consequence of the repeal of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, and we then said, "If the framers of the Act had said not only that defendants should answer a bill of discovery in equity, but should also answer interrogatories in an action of libel, much would have been done. At present a defendant can refuse at law to answer such interrogatories, on the ground that he would expose himself to criminal proceedings; and if so, the plaintiff must go to the Court of Chancery to get the very same questions answered."

The difficulty which we then anticipated has now occurred in Bowden v. Allen, which was an action for a libel in a magazine. The plaintiff administered interrogatories to the defendant asking if he was the publisher of the magazine. The defendant refused to answer, on the ground that he might by answering expose himself to criminal proceedings, and the Court of Queen's Bench held that he was not bound to answer.

The plaintiff must, therefore, either run the risk of failing to prove at the trial that the defendant is the publisher of the magazine, or must incur the delay and expense of a bill in order to procure a discovery to which he is admittedly entitled, but which he cannot obtain in the course of the action, in consequence of the defects of the common law procedure. This is certainly not a satisfactory state of the law, and most people will agree with Brett, J., "That this did seem to him a lamentable state of things. He supposed it was an omission in the last Act of Parliament, but it was such an omission that the sooner it was rectified by the Legislature the better."

It is to be noticed that at chambers Willes, J., in this case, allowed these interrogatories to be administered, leaving any objection to them to come from the defendant himself on oath. This is carrying very far the rule of practice that the objection that interrogatories are criminating cannot usually be made on the application for leave to administer them, but must come on oath from the party interrogating. The direct and only object of these interrogatories was to compel the defendant to admit that he had published a libel.

ON WEDNESDAY LAST the case of Mordaunt v. Mordaunt came before the Full Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, on appeal from the order of Lord Penzance. The judges were, Kelly, C.B., Lord Penzance, and Keating, J. It will be remembered that this is a suit for dissolution of marriage, and the question now in dispute is whether the insanity of the respondent, Lady Mordaunt, is a bar to the suit. The respondent was found to be insane by the verdict of the jury about two months ago, and subsequently Lord Penzance made an order that "no further proceedings be taken in this suit until Lady Mordaunt recovers her mental capacity." This order was a formal one made that the question might be raised before the Full Court, and Lord Penzance expressed no opinion one way or the other in making it.

The hearing of the appeal occupied Wednesday and part of Thursday last, and the Court have taken time to consider their judgment. We have before (ante 349) noticed the few English cases which bear directly on this point. In addition to these some American authorities were also cited in the argument.

MR. JOSHUA WILLIAMS ON THE REAL ESTATE INTESTACY BILL.

The paper read by Mr. Joshua Williams, Q.C., at a late meeting of the Law Amendment Society, though nominally dealing only with the Real Estate Intestacy Bill, already noticed in these columns, has really a far wider scope, and embraces the whole law of succession to real property. On the provisions of the particular bill in question we should not think it necessary to add anything to our former notice,* but that some of Mr. Williams' suggestions, connected more or less indirectly with this point, are of great value and importance, and would at any rate require special consideration if only on account of the authority due to the source from which they emanate.

Mr. Williams desires, and we fully agree with him, to get rid of the last traces of feudalism from our system of land tenure, and he would, for that purpose apparently, abolish heirship at law altogether, and vest all lands in the executors or administrators, to be dealt with in the same manner as personal estate. But in this he seems to us to overlook the essential differences, so often pointed out in these columns, between moveable and immovable property, differences not in the least due to or connected with the feudal system, and which cannot, we venture to think, be safely disregarded in any proposed amendment of the law. It is certainly not the case, so far as our experience goes, that leaseholds for long terms of years are "for all practical purposes the same as freeholds." On the contrary, for the very practical purpose of sale by auction they are, except in the case of houses in certain large towns, always at least one per cent., and often in a much greater degree, less valuable than freeholds: nay, we have known at least one instance where copyhold, undistinguishably mixed with long leaseholds, tended to raise the value of the whole, whereas if so mixed with freehold it would, as every conveyancer knows, and none better than Mr. Williams, have inevitably depreciated it. Whether this seemingly anomalous result is due to fancy, or to the exemption which real estate now enjoys from probate and administration duty, or to any greater pride of ownership still attaching to the possession of estates of inheritance, we cannot say, but such is the fact, and it must be fairly met if this question is to be properly discussed. For any alteration of the law which would put freeholds on the same footing with leaseholds would apparently operate to depreciate the value of the entire soil of England by about one ninety-fifth part; and this evil, though certainly too insignificant to stand in the way of any really valuable reform, ought not to be wantonly or inconsiderately incurred.

We agree with Mr. Williams that if the immovable property of an intestate is to be divided, the proper course is to direct a sale and division of the money. The evils of the indefinite subdivision of land, resulting in a deteriorated agriculture and an overcrowded semi-pauper population, are far more serious than any advantage which can be anticipated by the most enthusiastic advocates of the proposed change, and we are glad to see that Mr. Williams not only recognises these evils, but boldly adopts the only possible means of obviating them. At the same time there are certain other disadvantages inseparably connected with this plan of sale. To say nothing of the cost of successive sales, which in a few generations would go far to eat up the value of the smaller properties (and it is pretty generally admitted that only the smaller properties would be practically affected by any change in the law not fettering the power of testamentary disposition), it is impossible to disregard the instinct of "locality." By this we mean the feeling, which seems universal in the human species, except perhaps some of the negro tribes, by which the land where we were born, the property which we have inherited, the house in which we have lived, acquires a special value in our eyes utterly distinct from and independent of not only its own intrinsic value, but even any consideration of neighbours or nationality. For the peculiarity of this feeling—irrational, if you will, but not the less prevalent—is that it is the soil itself, and not merely the people that are on it, which is the object of affection, so that we constantly see persons return, often at considerable sacrifice, to the place of their early associations, though knowing that they will not find there a single person with whom they have any acquaintance or who will have any recollection of them. Now there is no class among whom this cat-like tendency, if we may so describe it, is stronger than it is among the smaller landed gentry—i.e., the class most likely to be affected by the proposed change of law; and nothing will, we think, be more calculated to provoke resistance to any such change on the part of this class (for whose benefit it is mainly proposed to be introduced) than any plan involving the necessity for sales of their land, which they would as a body look upon as little better than forced expatriation.

Perhaps the best way of meeting this difficulty would be to adopt for all estates the plan proposed by Mr. Williams for cases of hereditary rank—viz., that the land should descend unbroken to the heir, but charged with a proper provision for the other next of kin. The working of this plan might be further facilitated by attributing all the moveables in the first place to the junior next of kin, so as to reduce the ultimate charge on the land to a minimum; giving, however, liberty to the heir, should he in any case prefer it, to sell the land within a limited time, and on bringing the produce into hotchpot to take his share of the moveables instead. There are some isolated cases where this course would be desired, but we believe that, as a rule, the head of the family would be found to cling to the land, even though he thereby in effect paid an exaggerated price for it. The case of partnership lands, adduced by Mr. Williams, is not in point to this question, because such lands are, ipsâ naturâ rei, merely a form of capital, having no extrinsic value whatever; and in this case the rule which makes such lands real estate in the hands of the surviving partner might well be abolished, at least where such partner had not, by some unequivocal act, declared, after the determination of the partnership, his desire that such land should be so treated.

Again, we agree with Mr. Williams that the real estate of a married woman should not go to her husband to any greater extent than it does at present: nay, we go even somewhat further than he does, for if we rightly understand him he would give the surviving husband (or wife) an estate in fee simple in one-third of the wife's (or husband's) lands, whereas we cannot help thinking that the provision already made by law in this respect is ample, if not too great. In one point, however, the law on this matter seems to us to require amendment. The Dower Act, in its eagerness to free real estate from the restraints on alienation imposed by the old law of dower, not only enabled the husband to alien all his realty by act inter vivos, or by will, but even to defeat the dower by a mere declaration in the conveyance to himself, though it might operate only for the benefit of the heir. This seems to us to have been wrong, and we would propose that in all cases in which lands are suffered to descend to the heir, no matter what might have been the form of conveyance to the ancestor, such heir and his heirs and assigns should be bound to pay to the widow during her life one-third of the net rents after all proper deductions, in lieu of her dower "by metes and bounds," including, of course, a proper occupation rent in respect of any part of the property occupied by the owner for the time being himself. Tenancy by the curtesy we would be inclined somewhat to curtail. The reason of the rule that this right depends on the mere fact of issue having been born alive seems to be referable to the law respecting the old conditional fees before the Statute De Donis, and it is at any rate sufficiently absurd to warrant its abrogation. We do not see any good reason why the surviving husband should during his life exclude his wife's relations, in whom he has presumably no interest, from the possession of her real estate, although it may be reasonable enough that, as head of the family, he should be entitled to this possession to the exclusion of his own children. We would therefore limit tenancy by the curtesy to the cases where the immediate reversion was vested in some child or children or remoter issue of the marriage, and we would also, as Mr. Williams suggests, make the husband's right subject to any provision which the wife may have made by deed or will.

The question of alienation of real estate by married women is one of the utmost difficulty and perplexity: on the one hand it is absolutely necessary to throw over the wife some protection against her own weakness and her husband's possible greediness, and on the other it is not desirable to render such estates absolutely inalienable during the coverture. We agree with Mr. Williams that the present system is a failure, and yet we are unable to suggest a better, short of an absolute restraint on alienation without the consent of the Court of Chancery, which we feel to be more than the occasion requires. Mr. Williams' suggestion, that "every married woman, with the concurrence of her husband, should have power to dispose of her real estate by a deed simply executed in the usual way," would simply hand over to nine-tenths of the husbands in the kingdom the fee simple of their wives' real estates within a short time after their marriage. At present husbands do not like the exposure and expense involved in separate examination and acknowledgment, and therefore the estate remains in the wife till some alienation is really desired; but upon Mr. Williams' plan a pocket deed vesting everything in the husband "in case of emergency" would be as usual as is now a disentailing deed by tenant in tail on coming into possession, "just to be ready."

We do not agree with Mr. Williams that the heir of the person last seized ought to inherit instead of the heir of the last purchaser. This question was considered, and the law deliberately altered, on the occasion of the last great reform of our real property law, and we think that the alteration was just in principle, and ought not to be disturbed. We do, however, quite agree that the heirs the stock of descent ex parte maternâ are unduly postponed, and would propose to substitute for the existing rule some such principle as the following. When the "last purchaser" is a purchaser only in a technical sense, and has in fact become entitled by gift, settlement, or devise from any relation, then the relations of such purchaser on the side whence the property has come should take before and in exclusion of all relations in equal degree of the other side; but subject to this qualification, all relations in any degree whatever on either side should take before and in exclusion of all relations in any more distant degree. When the last purchaser is a purchaser for valuable consideration other than marriage the descent should be the same as if he had acquired the property by gift ex parte paternâ.

By this rule the mother would inherit next after the father (or vice versâ), and brothers and sisters of the half blood by the same mother would come next after similar brothers and sisters by the same father, both sets of these being, of course, postponed to brothers and sisters of the whole blood.

We are utterly unable to concur in Mr. Williams' suggestion that the Crown is more entitled to a man's real estate than his second cousins, and we cannot even understand the suggestion that beyond the limit of first cousinship there is usually no expectation of provision. In our experience a man's nearest known relatives, however distant, are usually considered as naturally entitled to succeed him, and they most certainly, where there has been no ill-feeling or estrangement, expect to do so. The prevalent feeling in this respect is well illustrated by the common practice of testators of real estates, even of but moderate extent, who habitually, at least when they have no children of their own, devise their estates to every known relative in succession, according to their relationship, with an ultimate remainder to their own right heirs, so as to sweep in any unknown relative who might be able to prove his title.

One point, not noticed either by Mr. Williams or any of the speakers in the subsequent discussion, seems to us worth mentioning. If the distinction in the devolution of real and personal estate be preserved in any form whatever, we think the primary liability of the personality to the payment of debts, &c., ought to be abolished, and all debts and expenses come pari passu out of the real and personal estate in cases of total intestacy, and out of the residuary personalty and descended realty in cases of partial intestacy. The rule which sweeps away the entire fund of the next of kin for the payment of debts, whilst leaving untouched the property of the heir, seems to us to be productive of much greater hardship, and to involve far more practical injustice, than any arbitrary distinction (and all rules of descent must be arbitrary) in the descent of moveable and immoveable property.

COURTS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

(At Nisi Prius, before WILLES, J., and a Common Jury.)

Allsop v. M'Gowan and Danks.

This was an action by John Allsop, an attorney of Bromley, for a libel alleged to have been published in the Will o' the Wisp newspaper of the 6th of March last, of which paper the defendants were said to be the printers.

The article complained of was headed "Beggars and Beggary Natures," in which it was stated that Mr. Allsop had set a savage dog at a beggar, with various comments.

The plaintiff said that on Sunday morning, the 13th of February, he was reading the Church Service to his wife, when the maid servant informed him that a man was on the premises and trying the door. He went down, let loose his dog, who was barking, and who ran before him and attacked and bit a man named Webb. He pulled the dog off, followed the man, gave him into custody, and eventually preferred a charge against him, which was dismissed by the magistrates.

Serjeant Parry, Nasmith and Cunningham, for the plaintiffs.

Brandt for the defendant M'Gowan.

Waddy for the defendant Danks.

Brandt contended that the article complained of was a fair comment upon what had occurred, and that the plaintiff did actually set the dog on to Webb, the man had been bitten in the arm, the hand, the leg, and the back; if the dog was ferocious the plaintiff ought not to have let him out; if he was quiet the plaintiff must have set him on, otherwise he would not have bitten Webb so seriously.

Waddy contended that his client was only a servant in the employment of Mrs. M'Gowan, the other defendant, and WILLES, J., ruled that he was not liable; but as to Mrs. M'Gowan, although she had personally nothing to do with the printing of the paper, she was answerable for what was printed in what was clearly her establishment. It was proved that she was an old lady verging on eighty, and the plaintiff admitted that he had brought about five other actions for reports of Webb's case in different newspapers.

Verdict for the plaintiff against M'Gowan—Damages £60.

April 25.—Jones v. Bewicke.

Cooper moved for a new trial, on the ground that the damages were excessive. The action was for a libel in charging the plaintiff with perjury in two letters written to the plaintiff's attorney, and also for addressing a letter to the plaintiff as "Old Perjury Jones, Llanelly." The defendant, in 1868, married the daughter of the plaintiff, a solicitor, of Llanelly. The marriage was an unhappy one, and on the wife's application a divorce was obtained in the Divorce Court, Lord Penzance decreeing to her alimony amounting to £250 a year out of the defendant's estate. The amount of that alimony was arrived at on evidence given by Mr. Jones as to what he had heard the defendant say his estate was worth. On the first quarter's payment becoming due the defendant sent it in a letter to Mr. Jones' attorney, accusing Mr. Jones of having committed perjury in his evidence. On the next payment becoming due he sent a similar very violent letter. The next payment he enclosed in a registered letter to Mr. Jones, addressed outside to "Old Perjury Jones, Llanelly." The postmaster, knowing something of the matter, sent this letter by a clerk to the plaintiff and, so far as this and the other letters went, there was no pretence for saying the plaintiff was injured by the defendant's conduct. Mr. Bewicke had conducted himself in a very unfortunate manner when in the Divorce Court. The action resulted in a verdict for £500.

BRETT, J., said in his opinion the conduct of Mr. Bewicke in the Divorce Court had been most disgraceful, and the only excuse that could be suggested for him was that he was not responsible for his actions.

Cooper said Mr. Bewicke wished to express his regret for the expressions he had then used. With regard to the injury Mr. Jones had sustained, he submitted that he ought to be satisfied with a verdict and nominal damages. But he had got £500, which was a very heavy sum to receive for what had occasioned his character no damage. Mr. Justice Byles had stayed execution to enable him to make this motion.

The Court said they would consult Mr. Justice Byles on the matter.

(Before BOVILL, C.J., and BYLES and BRETT, JJ.)

April 27.—In Re Thomas Eaton, an attorney.

An attorney may be struck off the rolls for fraudulent conduct dehors the scope of his functions as an attorney.

In this case, Garth, Q.C., on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society, had obtained a rule nisi calling on Mr. Thomas Eaton, an attorney, to show cause why he should not be struck off the roll of attorneys.

The charge against Mr. Eaton was that he had been in the habit of answering advertisements for the sale of estates and entering into contracts to purchase, with no intention of completing, and on delivery of abstract raising technical and other objections, and finally offering to forego the contract on payment of a sum of money.

The charge had been referred to Master Bennett, who reported that from 1861 to 1869 Mr. Eaton had been in the habit of inducing intending vendors of estates to enter into open contracts for their sale by offering sums above their value, without any intention of completing such contracts, and then raising objections to the title, generally unfounded, and merely technical, for the purpose of extorting money from the vendors to be let off their contracts. These proceedings had been systematically pursued for the purposes of fraud and of extorting money. In one or two cases the vendors had carried the cases to the court, when Mr. Eaton had been defeated, and had had to pay the costs. The master having read his report, Joyce, for Mr. Eaton.—My Lords, I do not know what I am to say after that report, but I merely submit to your Lordships that these matters are really not matters done in the office of an attorney.

BOVILL, C.J.—Do you think the taking advantage of his professional knowledge as an attorney in endeavouring to entrap the unwary over a series of years is not within his province as an attorney?

Joyce.—I have always thought the application to strike a man off the rolls should be for acts done in the office of an attorney.

BOVILL, C.J.—Do you think that a man being guilty of fraud is not sufficient to take him off the rolls?

Joyce.—Your Lordship sees the striking off the rolls will not prevent this class of business being carried on.

BOVILL, C.J.—He has been acting as an attorney, because one ground on which he asked for money and obtained it was, that he had incurred costs, those being costs that he had charged himself.

Joyce.—After that it is difficult for me to say—

BOVILL, C.J.—Difficult for you to say he is a man fit to remain on the rolls of the court.

Joyce.—I do not think striking off the rolls will remedy the present evil.

BOVILL, C.J.—But there may be another remedy besides that. Men who pursue such a course may find out the law is strong enough to reach them.

Joyce.—I will not occupy the time of the Court.

BOVILL, C.J.—We need not trouble you Mr. Garth. This application is made calling on Mr. Thomas Eaton to show cause why in one alternative he should not be struck off the roll of attorneys of this court. The charge against him was that for many years past he had been in the habit of drawing intended vendors and purchasers of property upon contracts towards himself, without any intention on his part of purchasing, but with an intention of finding some technical or colourable ground for refusing to do so, and thus obtaining compensation for abandoning the contract. That charge was investigated before the master, there having been various affidavits produced in court requiring the attorney to show cause why he should not be struck off the rolls. Many cases have been investigated by the master, commencing in the year 1861 and coming down to the year 1869. When the matter was investigated before the master, Mr. Thomas Eaton had an opportunity of attending to give any explanation that he thought fit, but he has not attended before the master to be examined personally. Probably there is very good reason for his not attending, and from the circumstances that were proved in the cases that were investigated, the master is satisfied that what took place in this case was a portion of a systematic course of fraud. The master distinctly finds that; and if it was part of a system of fraud the probability is that, if Mr. Eaton had presented himself for examination, not only these cases could not have been explained, but some light might have been thrown on some of his other transactions, and probably not very favourably to himself. However, we do not take that into consideration, because it is quite sufficient, on the cases that have been investigated, to say that the master is fully justified in stating his finding that these contracts were fraudulently entered into by Mr. Eaton with no bona fide intention to complete them, but with the view of extorting money from the vendors by raising difficulties which they would be unable to remove. Those objections are found by the master to have been in some instances purely technical, and in others colourable only, and not raised for any bona fide object of obtaining protection as a purchaser. In many instances Mr. Eaton did not even go to see the property, and the result is that the master has come to the conclusion that Mr. Eaton has been guilty of fraud and misconduct with reference to the matters contained in these rules. It is not sought by Mr. Joyce at all to impugn the conclusion at which the master has arrived. Indeed, on these facts it was impossible for him to do so. He suggests that these matters found by the master were not connected with Mr. Eaton's office as an attorney; but that objection fails entirely, if it were the only objection, because here was the case of an attorney availing himself of his knowledge of the profession, not for the purpose of assisting the Court and advising clients, but using his knowledge for the purpose of defrauding those not so well acquainted with the law as he was. I should be sorry to lay down any such narrow rule as that the misconduct of the party must be in his character simply of an attorney. It is manifest that there is no such rule. Each case depends on the circumstances, and the question is whether such a man is fit to remain upon the rolls of the court—whether he should be left to remain a member of an honourable profession in which the important interests of his clients are placed in his hands. It is clear in this case he has been guilty of gross fraud and misconduct, rendering him unfit to be an officer of the court; and, therefore, I think that the rule should be made absolute to strike him off the rolls.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have listened with great attention to the statement of the master. I collect that in eight or nine cases Mr. Eaton entered into contracts with no intention of completing them, but knowing very well from his knowledge as an attorney that he should be able to entrap the vendors, and in those cases he has used the contract simply as a means of obtaining money. I agree with the master that those two other cases in which he has not succeeded are against him and not for him, for in those cases he had not even a pretext for the objections. Mr. Joyce says he did not act as attorney. He used his knowledge as an attorney, as my Lord has pointed out, for a fraudulent purpose. He was, at all events, his own attorney, and if he acts in this manner when he represents himself, what can you expect he will do when he represents other parties and has to deal with third persons? The master has drawn a conclusion, which I confess I should have drawn myself, that there was no intention to carry the transactions out. He (Mr. Eaton) was drawing unwary vendors into a snare. The master has further found that these are steps in a systematic course of fraud, and in those cases in which Mr. Eaton did not succeed, it was because he was caught in his own snare.

BRETT, J.—No one who has heard the evidence can doubt that this man has been systematically an ignominious and fraudulent cheat, and I hope there is no foundation for the proposition which Mr. Joyce glanced at, and did not attempt to support, that if a man bears such a character as that, and it is proved against him, he is allowed to remain on the roll of attorneys because he has not acted as an attorney. I hope there is no such rule, and until such a rule is proved by the most conclusive authority I, for one, should not listen to it. I think such a man is dangerous not only to an honourable profession but to any profession or trade in this kingdom, and I think it is highly proper that he should be struck off the roll of attorneys.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(In Banco, before the LORD CHIEF BARON and MARTIN, PIGOTT, and CLEASBY, BB.)

April 22.—Mathews v. Collis and Another.

This was an action against the defendants, a Birmingham firm of solicitors for negligence in not putting in force a writ of capias against a gentleman named Lawton, whereby he escaped to America, and the plaintiff had to follow him thither and effect a compromise of a debt of $7,000 due to him, losing more than one-half of that amount, as well as being put to very considerable expense and trouble. The plaintiff sued the defendants for the balance of his claim against Lawton, and the expenses he had incurred in attempting to enforce payment of the whole debt. The case was tried before Bramwell, B., and a special jury, on Feb. 9 (ante p. 316) when the plaintiffs obtained a verdict for £1,800.

Sir John Karslake, Q.C. (with him Inderwick), now moved for a rule for a new trial on behalf of Mr. Collis, on the ground that the damages were excessive. He stated that the learned Baron at the trial expressed his dissatisfaction with the verdict, and stayed execution.

Henry James, Q.C., moved for a similar rule on behalf of the other defendant.

Rules granted.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

April 21.—Re Zalmanson.

Receiver—Sale of Debtor's Effects.

The debtor, Joseph Zalmanson, had filed a petition for arrangement under the 125th and 126th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and on the 21st March a receiver was appointed who had possession of the debtor's effects, and had carried on his business—that of a grocer—until the present time. A first meeting had been held under the proceedings, but in consequence of the omission from the list of the names of certain of the creditors, it became necessary to hold a substituted meeting, which had been fixed for the 10th May.

Read, for the receiver, now applied, upon affidavit, for an order for the immediate sale of the debtor's effects, stating that it would be of advantage to the creditors that the property should be forthwith realised. It appeared that the business was being carried on at a loss.

The CHIEF JUDGE held that inasmuch as no valid meeting of the creditors had been held he had no power by law to order a sale.

Application refused.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869. ss. 125, 126, rule 260—Injunction to restrain Bankruptcy proceedings—When disallowed.

On the 6th April two petitions for adjudication of bankruptcy were filed by creditors against Sir Roger Charles Doughty Tiahborne, Bart., which were returnable this day. Yesterday, the 20th April, the debtor filed a petition for arrangement under the 125th and 126th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

Read now applied ex parte on behalf of the debtor under the 260th of the new rules for an injunction restraining the petitioning creditors from proceeding further in bankruptcy. He stated that it would be of considerable advantage to the general body of the creditors that proceedings in bankruptcy should be restrained. The debtor was the claimant to large estates in Hampshire, and an adjudication might have the effect of staying a suit, now ripe for hearing, for the recovery of the property.

The CHIEF JUDGE held, that having regard to the delay which had taken place in presenting the petition for arrangement, it would be extravagant in the highest degree to grant the injunction asked for. A creditor had a legal right upon proof of the necessary requisites to obtain an adjudication against his debtor, and his Lordship could not speculate as to what the result of that adjudication might be. The application might be renewed upon proper grounds, in case an adjudication was actually obtained against the debtor, but the Court could not hold out the slightest encouragement to him. At present no reason whatever seemed to exist why the application should be granted.

Application refused.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 28—Practice.

In this case the creditors of the bankrupt had resolved to accept a composition of ten shillings in the pound payable by instalments in discharge of their debts; that the property should remain in the custody and under the control of the trustee until the instalments were fully paid; and that the bankrupt should in the meantime carry on the business—that of a dealer in jewellery. It was further resolved that the resolution should be carried out by a deed to be prepared for that purpose, and to be executed by all necessary parties, and that the bankruptcy should be annulled. This was a sitting for the public examination of the bankrupt.

Bagley, for the trustee, referred to the 28th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and applied for the direction of the Court with regard to the orders necessary for carrying out the intended arrangement.

The CHIEF JUDGE, after considering the terms of the section, was of opinion that, when all the requisites had been complied with, the duty was cast upon him to look through the deed and approve it. But, apart from the resolution, there must be a specific order to annul; and the two things could not be done simultaneously.

The deed was then produced, and his Lordship undertook to peruse it.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 13—Petition for adjudication—Injunction to restrain sale of debtor's effects when adjudication not obtained.

This was an application to restrain Messrs. Elphick, execution creditors, from selling the goods of a debtor, against whom a petition for adjudication had been filed. The petition was presented on the 8th April by a French creditor, the act of bankruptcy relied upon being the non-payment of the amount of a debtor's summons, and was returnable on the 2nd of June. Mr. W. Cotterill, who had been in practice as a solicitor, had absconded from England, and up to the present time the petitioning creditor had been unable to effect service of the petition. Prior to his disappearance from this country Cotterill resided in the neighbourhood of Dulwich Wood Park, and his furniture at the house was of considerable value. On the 14th February Messrs. Elphick obtained a judgment against the debtor for £87; they had since caused an execution to be levied upon his effects at Dulwich Wood Park; and the present application was made for the purpose of restraining a sale by the sheriff.

Bagley, in support of the application.

R. Griffiths, for the execution creditors, said the affidavit in support of the application was extremely vague, for all the deponent stated was that the debtor had formerly resided at the address given, and that the furniture and effects there, as he was informed and believed, were of considerable value. It did not appear from the affidavit to whom the property belonged.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—The affidavit might be more explicit, but it is clear that the execution can only be available against the effects of the debtor.

R. Griffiths submitted that it would be a hardship, if the execution creditors were entitled to the proceeds of the sale, that they should be restrained.

The CHIEF JUDGE said he understood that a receiver had been appointed; and, if the execution creditors were entitled to the fruits of their judgment, their rights would be preserved and protected; all their rights would be undisturbed, except their right to sell that property which might be theirs and might belong to the creditors generally.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125, 126—Petition under adjudication of bankruptcy—Transfer of file of proceedings—Practice.

The debtors, Messrs. Goodbehere, filed a petition for liquidation by an arrangement or composition under the 125th and 126th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, in the month of February last, and at the second meeting held under the proceedings the creditors resolved that the estate should be wound up in bankruptcy and not by liquidation. On the 11th inst. the debtors were adjudicated bankrupts.

Bund, for the petitioning creditor, now applied for an order that the affidavits and other documents, filed under the liquidation, might be used in the bankruptcy proceedings, and that they might be transferred, if necessary, from the liquidation file to the bankruptcy file. He stated that very great expense would be incurred if the creditors were required to make their proofs over again; for, under the liquidation, no less than 130 affidavits had been filed. The Court had power to make an order of the nature sought for in the case of the intervention of a liquidation after proceedings in bankruptcy, and he submitted that the converse case would apply. This was the first application of the kind in the Court, and several others were dependent upon it.

Mr. Hackwood, solicitor for the debtors, referred to the practice under the arrangement clauses of the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and said that he was instructed to submit to any order the Court might make on the application.

The CHIEF JUDGE said it seemed very desirable to avoid the trouble and expense consequent upon making fresh affidavits, but it would be the duty of the trustee under the adjudication, when appointed, to look into the proofs, and, if he disputed any one, he must challenge it and investigate it. There must be one file now that the liquidation had ceased—one file, but two volumes perhaps.

Application granted.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125, 126—Petition under—Duties of receiver—Disputed claim—Practice.

The debtor in this case had filed a petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition under the 125th and 126th sections. A first meeting had been held and the second meeting had been appointed to take place early in May. At the first meeting a proof for £2,137 was put forward on behalf of a creditor, Hooper by name, and as it involved transactions extending over a period of twelve years, some of the items of the account being wholly disputed, the receiver was desirous of obtaining the direction of the Court as to what proceedings should be taken for the purpose of contesting the claim.

Mr. Wickens, solicitor, as appearing for the receiver, said his client stood in the position of a trustee for the whole of the creditors and he was desirous of adopting any proceedings the Court might sanction to be taken in the matter.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—The receiver has no right to institute any proceedings. He is not a trustee; his duty is simply to collect the estate of the debtor, and he has no right to make himself a party to any proceedings.

His Lordship refused to make any order at present, but intimated that if any difficulty arose at the second meeting, the matter might be disposed of by summons.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. LEWIS PRICE DELVES BRUGHTON, of the Calcutta Bar, has been appointed Administrator-General of Bengal, in succession to the late Mr. C. S. Hogg. Mr. Broughton was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in January, 1860, and was for a short time Recorder of Rangoon. He also fills the office of Registrar of the Archdeaconry of Calcutta, to which he was appointed at the beginning of the current year, and is the author of a work on the State of the Law in the Non-Regulation Provinces, noticed in our last week's issue.

Mr. JOSEPH GRAHAM, Acting Advocate-General at Calcutta, has been appointed a member of the Legislative Council of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. Mr.

Graham was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in November, 1852, and fills the substantive appointment of Standing Counsel to the Government of India.

Mr. ALFRED CRICK FREEMAN, solicitor, of Maldon, Essex, has been elected Clerk to the Board of Guardians of the Maldon Union, in the room of William Codd, solicitor, resigned. Mr. Freeman was certificated as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1863.

Mr. JOHN EVANS, solicitor, of Wrexham, Denbighshire, has been appointed by the Right Hon. Dr. Lushington, Master of the Faculties for his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, to be a Notary Public for the district of Wrexham, and a circuit of twenty miles.

Mr. RICHARD CLARKE, of Shrewsbury, Salop, has been appointed a Commissioner to Administer Oaths in Chancery.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

A COMPLAINT.

Sir,—A case was heard before Mr. Baron Channell on Saturday last at Westminster Hall in which I was the plaintiff's attorney, which turned out to be a most suggestive circumstance in favour of our branch of the profession having a right to plead in the superior courts. In autumn last my client was sued in the county court at a provincial town by an agister of cattle for the keep of two of his horses. He defended the action on two grounds: first, that his contract was not with the agister, but with another man, against whom he had a cross-demand; and secondly, that he had demanded the delivery of the horses of the agister before the cost of the keep accrued—there being no lien at law for agistment. In the county court he was defended by another attorney, but having come to me in the meantime upon other business he asked my advice upon this, and I quoted to him the cases in support of his contention that an agister has no lien except by express agreement, and put them down on paper. The provincial attorney, however, seemed to consider them as no value, and the judge was about to give a verdict in favour of the agister, when the defendant handed this note of the cases up to him, and he accordingly reserved his judgment, and eventually gave a verdict for the agister for the keep only up to the date of the demand for the horses. My client then instructed me to bring an action for the detention, which was heard on Saturday last; and partly in consequence of an illness with which he had been attacked that morning, which rendered his memory indistinct upon the facts, and partly through the manner in which the case was presented to the Court by counsel, my client was non-suited. The judge, however, took occasion while my client was giving his evidence to launch out into invective against me. Although I had been previously advised by both counsel that it was not necessary to have the county court summons or the previous attorney in court, the judge said I had been guilty of "gross negligence" in not having them there. They still insist that they were not necessary, and that the case could have been proved without it. The impression upon the jury and the public in court, however, was that my client was non-suited all through me, because I did not produce the county court summons. What fell from the bench therefore amounted to a most unwarrantable and damaging slander, and yet I have not only no redress, but I was unable to vindicate myself in court. My client entirely acquits me of all blame, but what I complain of is that I should be the victim of a most unjustifiable piece of petulance and impatience from the bench without having an opportunity given me of saying a word either in the witness-box in my defence or from the bar in explanation. Whatever were the merits of the case, the learned judge had no right whatever to condemn the conduct of an innocent party in such vehement terms without a hearing. If he had been a county court judge he would not have ventured to have done so. He would not only have been responsible in damages, but he would have suffered severely from a repatee in public. It is only one more instance in illustration of the iniquitous system of precluding us from a right of audience. A SOLICITOR.

[We are unacquainted with the facts of this case, except through the medium of our correspondent's letter; but we can hardly think it probable that Mr. Baron Channell should have been guilty of a "most unjustifiable piece of petulance and impatience."—ED. S. J.]

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

April 22.—The Naturalization Bill passed through committee.

The Poor Relief (Metropolis) Bill was read a second time. The Bridgewater and Beverley Disfranchisement Bill.—The Attorney-General moved [the second reading.—Mr. Neville Grenville hoped the measure would be postponed until hon. members could consider the reports.—Col. Stuart Knox moved to postpone the bill for three months.—After some discussion, the second reading was carried without a division.

The Mines Regulation and Inspection Bill was committed pro forma, and the next stage fixed for May 26.

The Wine and Beerhouses Act Amendment Bill was read a second time.

April 25.—Mansions on Settled Estates.—Mr. Stapleton obtained leave to bring in a bill to enable the owners of settled estates in England and Ireland to charge such estates, within certain limits, with the expense of building mansions as residences for themselves, as the owners of entailed estates in Scotland are already enabled to do by the Act of 10 Geo. 3, c. 51, known as the Montgomery Act.

Railway Accidents.—Mr. Denison moved for a select committee to inquire into the law and the administration of the law of compensation for accidents as applied to railway companies. When he addressed the House last session upon this subject he did so entirely upon his own responsibility; but since then he had had the opportunity of conferring with the heads of almost all the railway companies, and he believed that in making this motion he now had their unanimous concurrence. The grievances of which the companies complained had been set forth in the petitions which he had presented upon the subject. It was urged that, for the benefit of the public, and in accordance with their requirements, they had undertaken unusual and special risks; that they had undertaken to carry passengers at a high rate of speed; that all those extra and special risks were by the law, as it stood, made to fall upon the railway companies, while they were compelled not only to exercise due care and vigilance, but to insure, in case of accident, the social position of the passengers injured. If it were argued that the rate of speed was within the control of the companies, he would ask, what would be the feeling in the minds of the public if the railway companies for one month only were by arrangement among themselves to reduce their speed to twenty or twenty-five miles an hour? Complaint on the subject would be general throughout the country, and yet they were subjected to a law which might have answered very well when the conditions of society were entirely different. When the maximum rate of speed was ten miles an hour, and when the conveyance was under the control of a single individual. He had no doubt, if this committee were granted, that he should be able to adduce such a body of evidence as would convince any fair and reasonable man of the existence of a very serious grievance. The report of the Royal Commission, of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Commissioner of Works were both members, by whom this subject had been considered, recommended, among other things, that railway companies should be held responsible when the accidents resulted from their negligence; that the amount of compensation should be regulated by the class by which the person injured was travelling, but that any passenger should, on the payment of a small extra tariff, be entitled to claim to insure for a higher sum; that claims for compensation should be made within a limited period, and that the companies should have a right to institute medical examinations in cases where injuries were alleged to have resulted from accident. There could be no doubt that railway companies suffered much from the prejudice of juries, and the latter so frequently made awards which would carry costs, that railway companies, rather than run the risk of being saddled with the costs of both parties, submitted in many instances to claims which they knew to be excessive, and which they believed to be fraudulent.—Mr. Hinde Palmer could quite understand that the hon. gentleman had consulted all the heads of the railway companies and obtained their concurrence for the motion he had made. It was not in behalf of the companies, however, but of the public that he moved an addition to the hon. gentleman's motion. At present the great and almost the only guarantee which the public had for the safety of passengers and for insuring the exercise of caution and care on the part of the railway companies was the heavy damages to which the companies were liable when accidents occurred; and if the object of the motion was to cut down the amount for which the companies were responsible it would so far diminish the guarantee which the public possessed. It was a necessary consequence therefore, that there should be an inquiry as to whether certain means could not be adopted to prevent these accidents altogether. He moved as an addition to the motion the following words, "and also to inquire whether any and what precautions ought to be adopted with a view to prevent accident."—Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson, in seconding the amendment, said that during the last three years the injuries and deaths from collisions, pure and simple, were 1,376, while from all other causes whatever they were only 595. That was a strong case for trying whether these accidents could not be prevented. If the Government laid down certain rules by which they should expect the companies to conduct their traffic, these companies on complying might require that their liabilities to some extent should be diminished. The recommendations made by the Government inspectors for the prevention of accidents had very largely increased during 1869; for in that year there were as many as 20 reports from those gentlemen on railway collisions, in which they recommended that the block system should be adopted on the line as the only adequate security against accidents. It was a question whether the Government should not have some power to enforce those suggestions.—Mr. Read objected to that question being considered with reference to the interest of railway directors, as the most important interest concerned in the matter was that of the public.—Mr. Shaw Lefevre said that, in assenting to the motion, he must not be taken to assent to the arguments and conclusions of the hon. member. The subject was a wide one, and involved other considerations. He had, no doubt, made out a strong prima facie case on behalf of the railway companies; they often suffered injustice at the hands of juries; they were mulcted very heavily in court. Cases of a monstrous character sometimes occurred, such as that mentioned last September, when a lady obtained £1,200 because she sprained her foot in tripping over a hole in a carpet at a railway station. Then there were cases of another kind, such as that of the late Mr. Pim, whose family obtained £12,000 damages against the Great Northern Company because he had neglected out of an ample estate to make provision for his younger children, and was killed in an accident. It had seemed to him that the Courts, in admitting considerations as to the future advancement of a claimant, the possibility of his rising in a profession had opened the door to claims of an almost exaggerated character; but hard cases did not always mean bad laws and bad legislation, and they must look rather further for the effect of the general working of the law. The whole amount paid by the companies, though large, formed but a small percentage of the gross receipts. Then, again, the principle on which the companies were responsible was one of very wide application. The responsibility of the employer for the negligence of his servant was a principle which ran through our whole jurisprudence, and in some respects it seemed to be a harder case that the owner of a carriage should be responsible if his coachman negligently drove over a man in the streets than if the railway company having engaged to carry a passenger safely, an accident occurred to him through the negligence of their servants. Shipowners, dock companies, and a hundred other such companies were subject to the same law. Another consideration was the extent to which the present law operated as an inducement to railway companies to adopt all reasonable precautions to prevent accidents. It had been the settled policy of Parliament hitherto not to interfere in the management or working of railway companies, but to hold the companies responsible for their negligence. In the case of ships Parliament had interfered to a greater extent and in a variety of ways, and in introducing the Merchant Shipping Bill he relied upon the same principle. He should himself be unwilling to lessen in any material way that sense of responsibility on the part of those great carriers over whom they had so little control; and if they were to do so to a small extent, it would be desirable to consider whether some greater control ought not to be exercised over them with a view to the prevention of such accidents. Perhaps means might be devised for preventing those grosser cases without really diminishing the responsibility of railway companies. The Royal Commission, while upholding the importance of not relieving companies of the responsibility, were of opinion that, on the one hand, companies should be absolutely responsible for all injuries to passengers not due to the personal negligence of such passengers, and second that their liability should be limited within a maximum amount. They did not state what such maximum should be, but he apprehended, from other portions of their report, that it would be a high maximum as compared with anything that the hon. member had suggested. The principle aimed at had already been to a very limited extent conceded by this House in the case of two or three metropolitan companies, which were compelled to run workmen's trains at a very low price. Parliament had also limited the compensation in the event of accident to £100, and had provided special arbitration clauses, which were much valued by the companies.—The motion, with the addition of the words proposed by Mr. Palmer, was then agreed to.

Payment of Rates by Charities.—Mr. Muntz, obtained leave to bring in a bill to relieve churches and elementary schools from payment of local rates.

April 27.—The Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. Committee.—Mr. Walpole moved, as an amendment to the motion for going into committee, "That it is inexpedient to alter the law of marriage, which has existed in this country from time immemorial, as to the degrees of kindred and affinity within which marriages are permitted, until Parliament has considered the whole question whether degrees of affinity should be put on a different footing from the corresponding degrees of consanguinity." The social system of the country, founded on the law of marriage, had existed from time immemorial, and should not lightly be disturbed. It should not be lawful to marry within the family circle. Marriage as revised and purified by our Saviour, made the two so entirely one that each had all the other's obligations, &c. He could not believe there was any Divine command which would, even by inference, permit the proposed marriage. The present law had existed in Christendom nearly fifteen centuries. And the law lords had held that the law was what it had been from time immemorial, and could not be got rid of by going abroad. In Scotland it was an article of faith. It was said the aunt was the natural protectress of the orphans, but was she not a much better one as it was? It would be different when she became a stepmother; many sisters would decline the care altogether after the alteration of the law. It was false to say that the change was desired by the poor; it was the rich who wanted it. It was said that natural freedom allowed everyone to marry all those to whom he was related only by affinity. But could two brothers marry the same woman, or the uncle the niece? How could the marriage be sanctioned between a man and two sisters, and not between a woman and two brothers? If the law of marriage was once broken up the relaxation must be carried much further than the Bill proposed.—Mr. Monk seconded the amendment.—Mr. Gladstone observed that, excepting the Established Church and the Presbyterian communions, there was no religious community with whom it was a matter of conscience to maintain the prohibition which the present Bill proposed to remove; but, on the contrary, so far as the religious communities other than the Established Church and the Presbyterians had expressed a judgment, that judgment was adverse to the prohibition. He had for many years felt the pressure of the argument derived from the principle of general toleration and the difficulty of enforcing the rule of one particular religious denomination on the members of other denominations who denied its authority. The narrow ground taken by the amendment was that the introducer of this bill should not be permitted to raise a question on a particular point in the table of prohibitions, unless he was prepared to raise a similar question with respect to a multitude of other prohibitions. The introducer of the bill had proceeded on the practical view of this matter. There was diversity of opinion on it among all political parties and religious denominations. Many bishops and clergymen of high standing were in favour of the legalisa-tion, notably the Dean of Chichester, whose opinion carried very great weight. But the amendment asked them to leave the practical ground and grapple with an abstract question—the question whether a distinction was to be drawn between degrees of affinity and consanguinity. The argument of natural freedom had been used, but for his part he preferred to avoid all arguments of an abstract nature in a case of this kind. If he were told that the proposition to legalise marriage with a deceased wife's sister ought not to be considered apart from the general question of consanguinity and affinity, his answer was that that proposition was refuted by facts, and one of the facts was that for a whole generation they had been contending on the matter of this bill. With respect to natural freedom, there were, no doubt, cases in which limits must be placed on its exercise, for no one would hesitate to say that what was termed natural freedom, when it exceeded certain limits, might be called unnatural freedom; but, on the other hand, it was undeniable that this system of prohibitions had been pushed much too far, partly from an overstrained rigour of opinion, and partly sometimes from mere fancy, as when prohibitory degrees had been founded on sponsorship and baptism. The proposition now made was made within most restricted limits, had been sustained by the continuous opinion of a large number of persons for twenty or thirty years, and had received, on almost every occasion, and sometimes under remarkable circumstances, the sanction of the representatives of the people. It was now their duty to remove out of their way this stumbling block and cause of contention. He hoped that this would not be allowed to degenerate into a class question. He supported the bill not merely on the ground of the limited argument in favour of liberty, but also because, upon the whole, he believed it was for the religious and moral advantage of the mass of society that they should give up a restriction which was not sustained by the public conscience and conviction in the times in which they lived.—Mr. Beresford Hope said the true province of legislation and government in matters where salus populi was the suprema lex, was to administer the suprema lex where the varying conflicts of men's opinion would only embroil and never set at rest. No doubt the polygamy of Utah was an extreme case, but as such it was set up for our warning. It showed that there was a point at which every sovereign commonwealth must intervene between man and his opinions, between man and his passions, and lay down some general law for the common safety—some general marriage law to govern the whole community. The marriage law of England was a very plain and simple one. It might be right or wrong, but it aimed at the utmost extent of liberty to be given in the matter of marriage consistent with what was believed to be an exponent of the voice of God. This bill would allow one class of marriages before the incumbent and another before the civil officer. That at once would set up two classes of marriages, breaking down the simplicity and uniformity of the system of conjugal relations in this land. What was this but a gigantic system of dispensations in favour of a particular class of marriages? If once they legalised marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister, marriage between an uncle and niece and between a nephew and aunt would follow. It would be a question of time, and a short time too.—Mr. Denman thought the principle upon which the bill was based was to be found in the New Testament, and it was that of removing an insupportable restriction, a burden the weight of which the people were not able to bear. So far as he could form an opinion from what had been written by learned divines and Jewish rabbis, the Mosaic law was rather in favour of the marriages in question than against them. The present law occasioned great hardship and much immorality and concubinage without producing any benefit.—Sir Roundell Palmer said it was shocking to his mind that there should be one law for England and another for Scotland and Ireland; therefore, if the legislation was right, it should extend to Scotland and Ireland. He dissented from the notion that the subject should be dealt with piecemeal, and had a strong conviction that it should be dealt with as a whole. It should be shewn where the line was to be drawn. He thought the bill a Levitical and Mosaic one, because the advocates of the change founded their arguments on one obscure text, saying that that did not forbid the marriage, and therefore it should be legalised. He protested strongly against the retrospective provisions of the bill. No doubt those who supported it would think it of little value unless it were retrospective, because the whole object which they had in view was to legalise their illegalities. But to make the bill retrospective would be, on such a subject as this to encourage a contempt for the law; to teach people that they might break it with impunity, trusting not only to get it changed, but to get that change made retrospective. He then argued against the change on social grounds.—Mr. Thomas Chambers replied. It was certainly not true that the law had been the same all through our historical times. Nothing had been adduced to prove that affinity and consanguinity were identical.—On a division the amendment was lost by a majority of 184 to 114.—An amendment proposed by Mr. J. G. Talbot, to deprive the measure of its retrospective operation, was negatived by a majority of 177 to 90.—The remaining clauses were agreed to, and the bill ordered to be reported.

The Mortgage Debenture Act (1865) Amendment Bill was read a second time, Mr. West explaining that it was a measure to cure certain defects in the bill of 1865 for the issue of Mortgage Debentures secured on land.

Admiralty District Registries.—A bill by Mr. Graves, for establishing admiralty district registries, was read a first time.

April 28.—The Irish Land Bill.—Committee. Adjourned debate on Mr. Headlam's amendment to clause 3 to add a proviso "that nothing in this Act contained shall exonerate a tenant under lease from the duty of giving up peaceable possession of the demised land at the end of the term, nor shall a landlord resuming possession at the termination of a lease be deemed to be disturbing a tenant within the meaning of this Act." Mr. Headlam said his amendment had been much misrepresented. It was not contrary to the principle of the bill.—The Attorney-General, while exonerating Mr. Headlam from all imputation of anything like mala fides, said the amendment was distinctly contrary to the principle of the bill. The scheme of the clause was that with respect to all future tenancies from year to year, and all leases for terms less than thirty-one years, the landlord should, on resuming possession, pay a certain sum which might be called damages for the eviction or disturbance of the tenant. The amendment proposed that nothing should exonerate a tenant holding under a lease from the duty of giving up peaceable possession. Mr. Headlam tried to prove that it was the duty of a tenant under a lease to give up possession at the end of the term, but that it was not his duty in the same sense if he held the land from year to year, and received a notice to quit. The distinction was illusory, without foundation in law, and altogether idle.—Ultimately the amendment was withdrawn.—Sir J. Gray carried, without division, an amendment removing "consenting," without the consent of the landlord, from the list of offences which are to deprive a tenant of his right to compensation.—An amendment by Mr. Kavanagh, relieving from the penalties of subletting the letting of a portion of land not exceeding half an acre to agricultural labourers bona fide required for the cultivation of the holding, was opposed by Mr. C. Fortescue and ultimately afterwards rejected by a majority of 284 to 218.—Mr. Kavanagh carried an amendment, with the assent of the Government, limiting this privilege to holdings of twenty-five acres and upwards in extent of tillage land.—Mr. C. Fortescue introduced a further limitation to the effect that the number of cottages provided for by these sublettings shall not be more than one for every twenty-five acres of tillage land.—Mr. Peel proposed to require by express words that the labourers shall actually be employed on the holding, but this proposal was negatived by a majority of 270 to 210.—Having now reached the end of subsection 2 of clause 3, the committee was again adjourned.

The Naturalisation Bill.—On the order for considering this bill as amended, Mr. Vernon Harcourt moved to omit clause 4 and insert the following clauses:—"From and after the passing of this Act no person born within the dominions of her Majesty of an alien father, which person at the time of his birth became under the law of any foreign State a subject of such State, shall be deemed a British subject by reason only of his birth within the dominions of her Majesty." "From and after the passing of this Act, persons born out of the dominions of her Majesty whose fathers are at the time of their birth British subjects shall be deemed British subjects; provided that no such persons shall be deemed British subjects by reason only of their birth where their fathers have resided within the dominions of her Majesty." "Repeal so far as they are inconsistent with this clause the provisions of the following statutes:—25 Edward 3, stat. 2; 7 Anne, c. 5; 4 Geo. 2, c. 21; and 13 Geo. 3, c. 21." Why should they give to the children and grandchildren of foreigners, merely because they were accidentally born in this country, and whose mothers, perhaps, had been in England only for a few days or a few weeks, the privileges of British subjects, which they might not desire?—Sir Roundell Palmer said these proposals would, if adopted, introduce an element of confusion into those relations which the convention aimed at adjusting. The double allegiance could not be completely got rid of without the aid of other nations. The commissioners thought it important to have such a rule as would at once get rid practically of difficulties with other countries abroad, and at the same time not introduce any unnecessary difficulties at home. They had to deal not only with the case of transitory foreigners, but with the more numerous cases of children born in this country—the children of persons long resident here for purposes of trade, foreigners by birth, and, perhaps, still by nationality—persons, the great majority of whom had not thought it worth while to get letters of naturalization; and if, for the sake of any uniform theory, the status of these children was made to follow the status of the parents as to nationality, a practical hardship and disability would be inflicted upon a large and important class of persons who were most valuable British citizens. If the proposal were adopted that after the passing of the Act "no person born within the dominions of the Queen of an alien father, which person at the time of his birth became under the law of any foreign State a subject of such State, shall be deemed a British subject by reason only of his birth;" it would be necessary to inquire into the law of all foreign countries before you could determine whether a person was or was not a British subject. To be obliged for all purposes of Parliamentary and municipal franchise to ascertain whether the father at the birth of the child was a citizen of a foreign country, and to determine this point not by our own law, but by the law of other nations, would introduce the greatest uncertainty. There was no simple uniform rule in other countries. These were reasons for not hastily changing the law. All practical purposes were answered by the clause as it stood.—The amendment was negatived.—Mr. Charley proposed to omit the words "real and," and to insert "and real property of every description may be taken, acquired, held and disposed of by an alien becoming such in pursuance of this Act."—The Solicitor-General said it was impossible for the Government to accede to the amendment. If it were adopted, persons disavowing British nationality, who might have gone to America and returned to this country for purposes for which some persons did return, would have a right to acquire real property which would be denied to a French nobleman.—The amendment was then negatived, and the report of amendments in the bill agreed to.

Conventual and Monastic Institutions.—After some discussion, the debate on this subject was again adjourned, on the understanding that it should be disposed of finally on Monday.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Easter Term, 1870.

QUESTIONS.

I.—COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. If an infant be a party jointly with an adult to a bill of exchange; are both, or either, liable to be sued on the bill?
2. Where an infant is not liable on a contract, can he be made liable thereon in an action in form ex delicto?
3. A bill or note in which no time of payment is specified, —when is it payable?
4. Is a tender, after a bill of exchange becomes due, a defence for the acceptor in an action by the indorsee?
5. The proprietor of a lighter agrees with A who works it, that in consideration of his labour, he shall receive half the gross earnings. Does this constitute a partnership?

6. Would a contract by A not to marry within six years be a valid contract at common law?
7. Can money lent for the purpose of gambling in a country where gaming is not illegal be recovered in the courts of this country?
8. If an agent contract under seal in his own name for his principal, can the principal sue on the contract?
9. Where an authority is given to three persons, if one exercised the authority would the principal be bound?
10. Is a wife's authority to order necessities revoked by the death of her husband, although at the time of the order the wife and tradesman were ignorant of the death of the husband?
11. What is a bottomry bond? Define it.
12. Who possesses the right to stop goods in transitu?
13. When does the right to stop in transitu cease?
14. If A guarantees the due payment of a bill of exchange, is A liable for the interest if the bill be not paid at maturity?
15. What is the distinction between inland and foreign bills of exchange as to protest?

II.—CONVEYANCING.

1. On the decease of a mortgagor, is a mortgage debt ultimately payable by the person to whom he may have devised the mortgaged estate, or is it payable by the executor of the mortgagor out of his personal estate? What alteration of the law has been made of late years in this respect?
2. If a man dies intestate leaving two daughters, the son of a deceased daughter, and the grandson of another deceased daughter, how does his real and personal property respectively descend?
3. If a man dies intestate leaving a sister, three children of a deceased sister, and a grandson of another deceased sister, how does his real and personal property respectively descend? And how would they descend if the sister surviving the intestate was only of the half-blood?
4. If an estate comprising freeholds of inheritance and leaseholds for years is limited to a man and the heirs of his body, what interest does he take in the freeholds and leaseholds respectively?
5. Some covenants are said to run with the land. Explain the expression, and illustrate its meaning by examples.
6. What difference is there in covenants for title—(1) by a vendor who acquired his estate by descent, and by purchase respectively; (2) by a mortgagor, and (3) by a mortgagee selling under a power of sale?
7. Explain what is meant by a mortgagee being entitled to "tack," and illustrate circumstances under which he can do so.
8. State the several points essential to constitute a contract for sale of land.
9. Out of what lands is a widow entitled to dower—(1) if married previously to 1834, and (2) if married subsequently to that year? What was the old, and what is the present method of barring dower.
10. State the mode by which a married woman may at the present day bar an estate tail in reversion.
11. Explain the operation which a fine had upon an estate tail, also a common recovery, and show the practical differences between them as modes of assurance.
12. Draw an outline of a deed suitable for a marriage settlement of £5,000 on each side, including a power to invest in the purchase of real estate.
13. State generally what succession duty is, in respect of what property it is payable, when it arises, how it is calculated, how it is payable, and whether the date of the instrument under which it takes effect as being before or after the Succession Duty Act in any way affects the liability.
14. What is the consequence both as regards the will, and a legacy bequeathed by it, if one of the attesting witnesses is the husband of the legatee?
15. If under a covenant not to assign except with the consent of the lessor in writing, such consent is given, is the assignee of the lessee again entitled to assign without a fresh consent by the lessor? What alteration of the law has of late years taken place in this respect?

III.—EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. What is the statute which governs the present system of uses and trusts in land, and what is the short effect of it?
2. What classes of persons may institute suits for the administration of the estate of testators or intestates?

3. In what cases does the wife's equity to a settlement arise?

4. Can a married woman dispose of her reversionary equitable interest? And has any, and what, change in the law in this respect been effected by recent legislation?

5. What is the rule of courts of equity with regard to dealings between persons in confidential relations, such as attorney and client, trustee and cestui que trusts?

6. State some of the cases in which courts of equity decree a dissolution of a partnership at the instance of one of the partners.

7. In suits for the specific performance of contracts for the sale and purchase of land, is the time fixed for the completion of the purchase considered material?

8. Where property is limited to the separate use of an unmarried woman independently of any husband whom she may marry, and with a restraint on anticipation, and she marries, becomes a widow, and marries a second time,—can she dispose of such property, before her first marriage, or while a widow, or during either of her marriages?

9. If a married woman, entitled to property for her separate use, execute a bond or sign a promissory note, is her separate estate liable for the debt?

10. If a settlement or will contain no power to sell or grant leases, and a sale or a lease be required, how would you proceed to obtain the requisite power?

11. Where a testator bequeaths property to A, and also bequeaths to B something which belongs to A, on what terms can A claim his legacy?

12. If a father makes a will bequeathing a legacy to a child, and afterwards settles a sum of money on the marriage of such child, and then dies, is the child entitled to the legacy?

13. When a cause is at issue how is the evidence taken?

14. State in what cases proceedings in the Court of Chancery may be commenced by summons at chambers?

15. What is the effect of the enrolment of a decree with reference to a rehearing or appeal?

IV.—BANKRUPTCY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. Specify the several persons who are particularly exempted from the definition of the term "trader," under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

2. Within what time after an act of bankruptcy must a petition for adjudication be presented?

3. Can a creditor holding security be a petitioning creditor, under any, and what terms?

4. By whom can a proof of debt be made?

5. What power has the court over any person known or suspected to have in his possession any of the estate or effects of a bankrupt?

6. When is a creditor in any bankruptcy, arrangement, or composition, to be guilty of a misdemeanour, and what punishment is he liable to?

7. Define the rights of a landlord for recovery of rent in case of the bankruptcy of his tenant.

8. What are the provisions regarding persons having privilege of parliament under the present Bankruptcy Act?

9. In whom does the declaration of a dividend vest?

10. When may an order of discharge be applied for by a bankrupt?

11. What is the status of a bankrupt who has not obtained his order of discharge?

12. A settlement of property by a trader is void against trustee if settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after date of settlement, except in certain cases,—what are these cases?

13. What are the first steps to be taken by a debtor desirous of arranging with his creditors by paying a composition?

14. What statement must a debtor produce to his creditors on a proposed liquidation by composition?

15. For the purposes of composition in calculating a majority, how are creditors to be reckoned whose debts are under £10?

V.—CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES.

1. Define a conspiracy.

2. Husband and wife are indicted together with a third person for conspiracy,—the latter is acquitted. Can the two former, or either of them, be convicted? Give the reasons for your answer.

3. In what cases can one person only be indicted for a conspiracy, and what averment is required?

4. Can an indictment for conspiracy be supported, although the object for which it was entered into be not effected?

5. What is a libel? And is it necessary in order to constitute a libel, that anything criminally or morally wrong should be imputed to the partly libelled?

6. Can a libeller be prosecuted criminally, as well as civilly and why?

7. Is the truth of a libel a defence to a criminal prosecution?

8. Is an attorney liable to any, and what punishment for giving notice that criminal proceedings will be taken unless his client's demand be settled?

9. State the nature of the offence of "champerty."

10. If on the sale of real or personal estate the solicitor of the vendor knowingly omits from the abstract of title any deed or instrument material to the title, of what offence is such solicitor guilty, and to what punishment would he be liable on conviction?

11. Will ignorance of law in any, and what, case excuse a person who has committed an offence?

12. What persons are held in law to be incapable of committing crimes or excused in respect thereof?

13. In what cases are married women protected from punishment for criminal offences, and in what are they not so protected?

14. What is the distinction between a principal in an offence, and an accessory?

15. What is an accessory before and what an accessory after the fact?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS AT THE FINAL EXAMINATION FOR HILARY TERM, 1870.

I.—COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By E. A. C. SCHALCH, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. The adult can be sued but not the infant. An infant is not liable upon a bill of exchange to which he is a party although it was given for necessities. But such bill is good against the other parties thereto.

2. No.—A person who has contracted with an infant cannot convert anything that arises out of that contract into a tort, and so enforce the contract through the medium of an action of tort. An infant cannot be made liable upon a contract by changing the form of action into one ex delicto. An infant is, however, liable for his torts, which are independent of contract even where the tort is to some extent connected with, although not founded upon a breach of contract (Burnard v. Haggis, 11 W. R. 644).

3. It is payable at once, and a writ may be issued upon it without any prior demand, as it is the duty of a debtor to seek out and pay his creditor.

4. No.—The tender to be good must be made on the day the bill becomes payable. But the drawer of a bill has a reasonable time after notice of dishonour to pay the amount of the bill.

5. No.—Even at common law such an agreement would not necessarily constitute a partnership, although it might, of course, be strong evidence of a partnership. But now 28 & 29 Vict. c. 86, s. 2, has expressly provided that "no contract for the remuneration of a servant or agent of any person engaged in any trade or undertaking by a share of the profits of such trade or undertaking, shall of itself render such servant or agent responsible as partner therein, nor give him the rights of a partner."

6. Prima facie it would not be a valid contract, although particular circumstances might possibly make it valid. Every contract in restraint of marriage is prima facie illegal (Hartley v. Rice, 10 East. 22).

7. Yes.—(Quarrier v. Colston, 1 Phill. 147). The general rule is that a contract must be governed as to its interpretation, validity and effect by the law of the country where it is made. This rule is subject to this, that "when a court of justice in one country is called on to enforce a contract entered into in another country, the question is not only whether or not the contract is valid according to the law of the country in which it is entered into, but whether or not it is consistent with the law and policy of the country in which it is to be enforced, and if it is opposed to those laws and that policy the Court cannot be called upon to enforce it" (Hope v. Hope, 5 W. R. 387).

It was held, however, in Quarrier v. Colston that money lent for gambling in a country where gambling is not illegal could be recovered here. This decision, it may be noticed, was before 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, which has made all contracts by way of gaming or wagering void.

8. No.—A principal cannot sue upon a contract under seal made in the agent's name only, for it is treated as a contract merely between the parties named in it, although one is known to be acting as agent. This rule is peculiar to contracts under seal and does not apply to simple contracts by writing or word of mouth.

9. No.—The general rule is that where an authority is given to several they must all join in exercising it, otherwise the principal will not be bound.

10. Yes.—The husband's death at once puts an end to the authority, whether or not his death is known to his wife or to the tradesman. In such a case the husband's executors are not liable for necessities supplied after the husband's death (Blades v. Free, 9 B. & C. 167); nor can the tradesman recover the price of the necessities so supplied in an action against the widow (Smout v. Ilbery, 10 M. & W. 1).

11. Bottomry is an agreement entered into by the owner of a ship or his agent, whereby, in consideration of a sum of money advanced for the use of the ship, the borrower undertakes to repay the same with interest if the ship terminate her voyage successfully, and binds or hypothecates the ship for the performance of his contract. The instrument by which this contract is made is called a bottomry bond, sometimes a bottomry bill.

12. The unpaid vendor of goods is the person entitled to stop them in transitu. A mere surety for the price of the goods cannot stop them, but a consignor of goods to be sold on the joint account of himself and the consignee may stop them.

13. The right of stoppage in transitu ceases the moment the goods have reached the actual or constructive possession of the consignee, who may require the goods to be delivered to him at any stage of the journey. As a general rule the goods are in transitu so long as they are in the possession of the carrier, and also while in any place of deposit connected with their transmission or delivery.

14. Yes.—A person who guarantees the due payment of a bill of exchange by the acceptor, is liable for interest thereon if not paid when due (Ackerman v. Eprensperger, 16 M. & W. 99).

15. A foreign bill if dishonoured should be protested. Inland bills require no protest when dishonoured; they are sometimes noted for non-payment, which is not, however, necessary.

II.—CONVEYANCING.

(By H. N. MOZLEY, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. On the decease of a mortgagor, the mortgaged debt is ultimately payable by the person to whom he may have devised the mortgaged estate, in cases falling under Mr. Locke King's Act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113), which provides to the above effect in cases where all the following conditions are satisfied:—(1.) Where the deceased may have died after the 31st of December, 1854; (2.) where the mortgaged property is land or other hereditaments (i.e., real property); (3.) where the deceased has not by deed or other document expressed his intention to the contrary. Independently of the above Act, where a mortgaged estate is devised cum onere, the mortgage debt is payable by the devisee. And where the debt was not contracted by the person who last died seised or entitled, but by some other person from whom he took it by descent or devise, or by some other person from whom he purchased it, or from whom his vendor derived it, his personal estate would not be primarily liable for the payment of the debt, unless he had done something to raise a new and independent contract between himself and the mortgagee.

In cases other than those above-mentioned, the general personal estate of the testator is primarily liable for the payment of the mortgage debt (See Smith's Manual of Equity, 7th ed., pp. 263—266).

2. The man's real estate in this case will be divisible equally in fourths between his surviving daughters, and the son and grandson of his deceased daughters respectively.

For the four daughters, if living, would have taken equally, and the son and grandson of deceased daughters stand in the place of their mother and grandmother respectively.

His personal property would descend in the same way by the Statutes of Distribution. (It is assumed that the intestate does not leave a widow surviving him.)

3. In this case, by section 5 of the Inheritance Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106), the descent, as regards the real property, is traced from the parent of the deceased; and, therefore, the real property is divisible equally in thirds between (1.) the surviving sister; (2.) the issue (in manner stated below) of the deceased sister who leaves three children; (3.) and the grandson of the other deceased sister.

The one-third share which passes to the issue of the deceased sister who leaves three children, will pass to the eldest or only son, if one or more of the three children be a son or sons; if they are all daughters, they will take the one-third share in equal thirds, or each will take one-ninth of the real property of the intestate.

The personal property of the intestate will be divisible equally in moieties between (1.) the surviving sister, and (2.) the three children of the deceased sister who leaves three children, who will each take one-sixth of the personal property of the intestate. The grandson of the other deceased sister will be excluded from a share in the personality, as, beyond brothers' and sisters' children, no right of representation belongs to the children of relatives with respect to the shares which their deceased parents would have taken (Williams on Personal Property, 7th ed., pp. 361—2).

If the sister surviving the intestate was only of the half-blood, this would make no difference as regards the personality; but she would be excluded from the realty.

4. A gift of freeholds to a man and the heirs of his body creates in him an estate tail; but an estate tail cannot be held in personal property, and a gift of personal property of any kind, and therefore of leaseholds, to a man and the heirs of his body will simply vest in him the property given (Jarman on Wills, 3rd ed., vol. ii., p. 534; Williams on Personal Property, 7th ed., p. 265).

5. Where either of the parties to a covenant has an interest in land, and the covenant is such that the benefit or burden of the covenant passes wholly or partially to any one who may, for the time being, be similarly interested in the land, the covenant is said, pro tanto, "to run with the land."

The following (among many other) are instances of covenants running with the land.

Covenants for title pass by the common law to the assignees of the land, who may maintain actions upon them against the vendor and his real and personal representatives.

Again, where the owners of land granted a watercourse through it to a man and his heirs, and covenanted for themselves, their heirs and assigns, to cleanse it, this covenant was held to bind the land in the hands of an assignee, for it was a covenant that ran with the land (Holmes v. Buckley, Prec. Ch. 39; Sugden, Vend. & Pur. ed. 1862, p. 593).

On this subject the reader is referred to Lord St. Leonard's work on Vendors and Purchasers, c. 15, s. 1, pp. 576—599 in the edition of 1862.

6. A vendor seised in fee covenants—(1.) That he is seised in fee; (2.) that he has power to convey; (3.) for quiet enjoyment by the purchaser, without disturbance by the vendor or any one claiming through him, his ancestors or testators; (4.) for freedom from incumbrances; (5.) for further assurance (Sugden, Vend. & Pur. ed. 1862, p. 573; Davidson, Conv., vol. 2, p. 184). These covenants do not guarantee a title against all the world, as covenants for title in a mortgage deed do. The purchaser is entitled to name specifically the persons whose acts are to be guarded against, and to carry back the covenant to the last occasion on which covenants were entered into on a mortgage or purchase for value (Sugden, Vend. & Pur. p. 574; Davidson, vol. 1, p. 195 (b), and vol. 2, p. 184).

If the vendor claim by purchase, in the common sense of the word, his covenants are confined to his own acts and those of persons claiming under him (Sugden, Vend. & Pur., p. 574; Davidson, Conv., vol. 1, p. 195, note (c), and vol. 2, p. 185).

The covenants for title in mortgages and securities for money are the same as in conveyances for sales, except that they are absolute instead of qualified. The covenants by a mortgagor are unrestricted, and amount to a warranty against and for the acts and omissions of the whole world.

A mortgagee selling under a power of sale merely covenants that he has done no act to encumber the property. See Sugden, Vend. and Pur., p. 69; Davidson, vol. 2, p. 236, note (f).

7. Where a first mortgagee has obtained a conveyance of the legal estate, and the estate is afterwards mortgaged to a second and third mortgagees, &c., the third (or any subsequent mortgagee), if he has made his advance of the money without notice of the second mortgage (or any other prior mortgage), may tack (as it is said) his mortgage to the first, and so postpone the intermediate incumbrancer (Brace v. Duchess of Marlborough, 2 P. Wms. 491; Peacock v. Burt, Coote on Mortgages, App. p. 569; Williams on Real Property, part 4, c. 2).

8. The points essential to constitute a contract for sale of land are: (1.) That it should be writing, and signed by all the parties named thereto, or their agents duly authorised; (2.) that the parcels of land should be described with certainty; (3.) that the amount of purchase-money should be stated.

9. A widow, if married previously to 1834, was entitled to dower out of any lands of which, during the coverture, the husband was at any time solely seised in possession for any estate of inheritance to which any issue which the wife might have had might by possibility have been heir. Dower did not extend to equitable interests.

By the Dower Act of 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 105), which applies to widows who have been married since the 1st of January, 1834, dower is extended to lands to which the husband had a right merely without having a legal seisin; dower is also extended to equitable as well as legal estates of inheritance in possession, excepting, of course, there is joint tenancy (sections 2, 3).

By the same Act, dower is placed completely within the power of the husbands.

10. A married woman may at the present day bar an estate tail in reversion by deed acknowledged, executed with the concurrence of her husband, and enrolled in chancery within six months from the making thereof (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 75, ss. 40, 41, 79). In order to bar the persons in reversion or remainder the consent of the protector is also necessary.

11. The effect of a fine was, by 32 Hen. 8, c. 36, to bar the issue, and so to enlarge the estate tail into a base fee. A common recovery barred the persons entitled in remainder as well as the issue, and enlarged the estate tail into an estate in fee simple.

12. The deed would contain—(1) The names of the parties to it; (2) the recitals, setting forth the agreement for the marriage and for the settlement, and of the payment of the two sums of $5,000 to the trustees; (3) declarations of trusts, until marriage, for the husband and wife respectively after marriage, power of investment with the concurrence of the husband and wife or the survivor, as therein specified, trusts of income as to the husband's $5,000 for the husband for life, and as to the wife's $5,000 for the wife for life for her separate use, with remainder as to the whole to the survivor during his or her life, remainder to children as husband and wife or survivor shall appoint; in default thereof, in trust for children equally who, being sons, shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being daughters, shall attain that age or marry; in default of children, the husband's share to be in trust for the husband, his executors, administrators and assigns, the wife's share to be in trust for herself, her executors, administrators and assigns, if she survive her husband, if she do not, then in trust as she shall appoint, and in default of appointment, in trust for such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if she had died possessed thereof intestate and unmarried; (4.) power to purchase real estate, such real estate to be held in trust for sale at any time, and the purchase-money to be held upon the trusts declared with reference to the original monies invested in the purchase thereof; (5.) power to apportion blended trust funds.

13. Succession duty is imposed by the Succession Duty Act, 1853, (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), and is payable on the succession to an estate. It applies to the whole of the United Kingdom, to property both real and personal, whether derived under settlement or by will, intestacy or survivorship. The husband or wife of a predecessor, testator, or intestate, is exempt from succession duty. By section 10 of the Act, where the successor is the lineal issue or lineal ancestor of the predecessor, the duty is one per cent. Where the successor is a brother or sister, or descendant of a brother or sister, the duty is three per cent. Where the successor is a brother or sister of the father or mother of the predecessor, or a descendant of such brothers and sisters, the duty is five per cent. Where the successor is a brother or sister of the grandfather or grandmother of the predecessor, the duty is six per cent. Where the successor is a more distant relation, or a stranger, the duty is ten per cent. By section 11 a husband or wife is entitled, in calculating the amount of legacy or succession duty, to take advantage of the nearer relationship of the other to the predecessor, testator, or intestate, from whom the benefit is derived. By section 21, the interest of a successor in real property is to be valued as an annuity according to the tables annexed to the Act, and the duty chargeable is to be paid by eight half-yearly instalments. By section 31 annuities are to be valued according to the tables annexed to the Acts.

By section 42 of the Act, the duty imposed thereby is to be a first charge on the property in respect of which the duty is assessed.

By section 2 of the Act, every past or future disposition of property by reason whereof any person has or shall have become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of the Act, &c., shall be deemed to confer a "succession"; so that it is immaterial for the purposes of the liability to succession duty, whether the date of the instrument is before or after the Succession Duty Act.

14. The will itself will in this case be valid, but the legacy will be void (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 15).

15. The assignee would, before the passing of Lord St. Leonards' Act, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, be again entitled to assign without a fresh consent by the lessor; although the assignment was only prohibited when done without license (Dunlop's case, 4 Rep. 119; Williams on Real Property, pt. 4, c. 1). By the statute 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 1, "Every such license shall, unless otherwise expressed, extend only to the permission actually given, or to any specific breach of any proviso or covenant made or to be made, or to the actual matter thereby specifically authorised to be done, but not so as to prevent any proceedings for any subsequent breach, unless otherwise specified in such license."

III.—EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. The statute which governs the present system of uses and trusts in land is the Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8, c. 10. By this statute it was enacted, that "where any person or persons shall stand seised of any lands or other hereditaments to the use, confidence, or trust of any other person or persons, the persons that have any such use, confidence, or trust (by which was meant the persons beneficially entitled) shall be deemed in lawful seisin and possession of the same lands and hereditaments for such estates as they have in their use, trust, or confidence." This statute was intended to abolish the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery over landed estates, by giving actual possession at law to every person beneficially entitled in equity. But this object was not accomplished; for the Court of Chancery soon regained its former ascendancy and has kept it to the present day. All that was ultimately effected by the Statute of Uses was to import into the rules of law some of the then existing doctrines of the courts of equity, and to add three words, to the use, to every conveyance (Williams on Real Property, pt. 1, ch. 8).

2. The following classes of persons may institute suits for the administration of the estates of testators or intestates:—(1) Creditors; (2) Legatees; (3) Parties interested in the residuary real or personal estate; (4) Executors or administrators. See Haynes' Outlines of Equity, pp. 107—112.

3. Where a husband becomes entitled, in right of his wife, in possession, to property which he is unable to recover at law, and the intervention of a court of equity is called into action, the court allows the husband to receive the property subject to what is called the wife's equity to a settlement, that is to say, unless the wife expressly waives this right; the court will inquire into all the circumstances connected with the marriage, and will, upon a consideration of all the material facts, decide how much of the property (if any) shall be paid to the husband, and how much (if any) shall be settled on the wife (Haynes' Outlines of Equity, p. 114).

4. A married woman may, by statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 57 (passed in the year 1857) dispose of her reversionary equitable interest in personal estate; but the disposition must be made with the concurrence of her husband, and with such formalities as are required in a disposition by a married woman of real estate. Nor can a married woman dispose of reversionary interests in personality which may have been settled on her by marriage, or as to which she may have been restrained from disposing of it by the terms of the gift or settlement by which she became entitled to it.

Previously to this statute a married woman could not dispose of reversionary equitable interests in personality.

5. The rule applicable to dealings between persons in confidential relations may be stated as follows:—Where a reasonable confidence is reposed by one person in another, or a peculiar influence is possessed by him in consequence of standing in a confidential relation, and he makes use of that confidence or that influence to obtain an advantage to himself at the expense of the party confiding in him or under his influence, he will not be permitted to retain any such advantage, however unimpeachable the transaction would have been if no such confidence had been reposed or no such confidential relation had existed (Huguenin v. Basile, 14 Ves. 273; Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, 2nd ed., vol. 2, p. 462, p. 504 in 3rd ed.; Smith's Manual of Equity, 7th ed., p. 70).

6. Courts of equity will dissolve a partnership before the regular time if, by reason of the ill-feeling between the partners, or other circumstances, it is impracticable to carry on the undertaking at all, or, at least, according to the stipulations of the articles, or beneficially, or in case of the insanity, permanent incapacity, or gross misconduct of one of the parties. And a partnership will also be dissolved at the instance of a partner who was induced to enter into it on a false representation (Smith's Manual of Equity, 7th ed., p. 331, and cases there cited).

7. "The principle upon which the Court acts is, that though the party has not a title in law, as he has not complied with the terms so as to entitle him to an action—as to the time, for instance—yet if the time, though introduced, as some time must be fixed where something is to be done on one side, as a consideration for something to be done on the other, is not the essence of the contract, a material to which they looked in the first conception of it, even though the lapse of time has not arisen from accident, a court of equity will compel the execution of the contract, upon this ground, that the one party is ready to perform, and the other may have a performance, in substance, if he will permit it" (Lord Eldon in Hearne v. Timent, 13 Ves. 289).

The general rule is, that where a vendor has proceeded to make out his title, and has not been guilty of gross negligence, equity will assist him, although the title was not deduced at the time appointed. In Fordyce v. Ford (4 Bro. C. C. 494), the purchase was to be completed on the 30th July, 1793; the abstract was not delivered until the 8th, and the treaty continued until the 26th September, on which day the deeds were delivered and every difficulty cleared up, when the purchaser refused to proceed, alleging that he wanted the estate for a residence for the last summer, and insisting that he was not bound to go on, on account of the delay. The Master of the Rolls said that the rule certainly was, that where in a contract either party had been guilty of gross negligence the Court would not lend its assistance to the completion of the contract; but in this case he thought there had been no such negligence, and decreed accordingly.

The whole subject is treated in the 6th chapter of Lord St. Leonards' work on Vendors and Purchasers, pp. 267–271 in the edition of 1862, to which, and to the cases there cited, the reader is referred.

a Before her first marriage she may dispose of such property (Woodmasson v. Walker, 2 Russ. & Myl. 197; Brown v. Fosco, 2 Russ. & Myl. 210).

b While a widow she may dispose of the property (Jones v. Satter, 2 Russ. & Myl. 208).

c During either of her marriages she cannot dispose of it, for the separate use with its accompanying restraint revives (Tullett v. Armstrong, 1 Beav. 1, affirmed on appeal, 4 Myl. & Cr. 377, overruling Massey v. Parker, 2 Myl. & K. 174. See Haynes' Outlines of Equity, pp. 212–215).

9. If a married woman, entitled to property for her separate use, executes a bond or sign a promissory note, her separate estate is liable for the debt (Hulse v. Tenant, 1 Bro. C. C. 16; Heatley v. Thomas, 15 Ves. 596; Bullpin v.

Clarke, 17 Ves. 365). For her execution or signature would be worthless as evidence of a mere personal engagement; and the Courts of Equity therefore said, that they should be evidence of a contract to bind her separate estate. See Haynes' Outlines of Equity, p. 216.

10. If a settlement or will contain no power to sell or grant leases, and a sale or lease be required, applications should be made to the Court of Chancery under the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120) for the requisite authority. Under section 2 of that Act, leases may be made, on the authority of the Court of Chancery, for terms not exceeding twenty-one years for an agricultural or occupation lease; forty years for a mining lease, or a lease of water, water-mills, wayleaves, waterleaves, or other rights or easements; sixty years for a repairing lease, and ninety-nine years for a building lease, subject to the conditions prescribed by the Act. And where the Court shall be satisfied that it is the usual custom of the district, and beneficial to the inheritance, to grant leases for longer terms, any of the above leases, except agricultural leases, may be granted for such terms as the Court shall direct (Stat. 21 & 22 Vict. c. 77, s. 4). By section 23 of Statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, if the Court of Chancery should deem it proper, and consistent with a due regard for the interest of all parties entitled, a sale of any settled estate may be ordered to be made (Williams on Real Property, pt. 1, ch. 1).

11. Where a testator bequeaths property to A., and also bequeaths to B. something which belongs to A., A. can claim the legacy only on condition of resigning in favour of B. his own property or interest which is bequeathed to B.; or at least, A. cannot have the entire gift without compensating B., whom he has disappointed by electing to take his own property (Smith's Manual of Equity, 7th ed., p. 351).

12. If a father makes a will bequeathing a legacy to a child, and afterwards settles a sum of money to the marriage of such child, and then dies, the child will not in general be entitled to the legacy, but the legacy will be held to be satisfied by the settlement. It is not necessary, in order that this doctrine of satisfaction should apply, that the sums given by the two instruments should be payable at the same time, nor even that the limitations for the benefit of the child provided for be precisely the same. See Lord Durham v. Wharton, 5 Sim. 297, 3 Myl. & K. 473, 3 Cl. & Fin. 146; Haynes' Outlines of Equity, pp. 322–4, 331.

13. Unless a special order is obtained for taking evidence videlicet at the hearing, or a special agreement is entered into, the parties go into evidence, either wholly or partially by way of affidavit, or wholly or partially by the oral examination of witnesses ex parte before one of the examiners of the court, or a special examiner. Any witness may be cross-examined in court at the hearing of the cause. The ordinary practice of the Court as to evidence after issue joined may be stated thus: each party verifies his case wholly or partially by affidavit, or wholly or partially by oral examination of witnesses ex parte before one of the examiners of the court or a special examiner, and there is no cross-examination otherwise than at the hearing of the cause.

By rule 3 of the Order of February 6, 1861, it is provided that, upon summons taken out by any party within fourteen days after issue joined, the judge at chambers may make an order that the evidence in chief as to any particular facts and issues be taken videlicet at the hearing. For other exceptions which may be made to the general practice, see rules 10 and 11 of the same order. See also Mr. Chapman Barber's statement in Haynes' Outlines of Equity, App. pp. xxi–xxiii.

The above observations apply to the case where issue is joined by replication. In the case of an intended motion for decree under the statute 16 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 16, the plaintiff, having filed such affidavits as he considers sufficient, gives notice to the defendants that he intends, at the expiration of one month from the notice, to move for a decree, and at the foot of the notice of motion he specifies the affidavits which he intends to use in support of the motion. The defendant has a fortnight's time (often extended by special order) to file affidavits in answer, and the plaintiff has a week (also often similarly extended) to file affidavits in reply. Consolidated Orders, Order 33, rules 4–7; Mr. Chapman Barber's statement, Haynes' Outlines of Equity, App. pp. xvii, xviii).

14. Proceedings in the Court of Chancery may be commenced by summons at chambers for certain purposes connected with the administration of a deceased person, either by a person interested in the estate of the deceased, under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 45, 47, or by executors or administrators, under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s. 14 (See Hunter's Suit in Equity, 4th ed., by G. W. Lawrance, pp. 231—236). Proceedings for the rectification of a joint stock companies' register, under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 35, may also be commenced by summons at chambers; and also applications for the guardianship and maintenance of infants, and certain applications under the Drainage Acts. (See Daniell's Chancery Practice, 4th ed. vol. ii. pp. 1070—1222; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 114, s. 21.)

15. The effect of the enrolment of a decree, with reference to a rehearing or appeal, is as follows:—The decree cannot, when enrolled, be varied by the simple and cheap process of rehearing, but it is necessary to have recourse to the House of Lords, or to file a bill of review. The House of Lords will not entertain an appeal from a decree which has not been signed and enrolled (Hunter's Suit in Equity, 4th ed., by G. W. Lawrance, pp. 91, 178).

IV.—BANKRUPTCY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By CHALONER W. CHUTE, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. Farmers, graziers, common labourers, or workmen for hire, and all members of any partnership, association, or company which cannot be adjudged bankrupt under the Act, are (as such) exempted from the definition of the term "trader" by the schedule to the Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71).

2. No person is to be adjudged bankrupt unless the act of bankruptcy on which the adjudication is grounded occurred within six months before the presentation of the petition for adjudication (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 6).

3. A creditor holding security may be a petitioning creditor, if he states in his petition that he will be ready to give up such security for the benefit of the creditors in the event of the debtor being adjudicated a bankrupt, or if he is willing to give an estimate of the value of his security, in which latter case he may be admitted as a petitioning creditor to the extent of the balance of the debt due to him after deducting the value so estimated; he will, however, be bound, if the trustee require him so to do, to give up his security to the trustee for the benefit of the creditors, upon payment of such estimated value (section 6).

4. Every creditor may prove under the bankruptcy whether the bankrupt's debt or liability to him is present or future, certain or contingent, provided the liability existed at the date of the adjudication, or arises during the continuance of the bankruptcy by reason of some obligation incurred previously to the date of adjudication; but these exceptions are made by the Act; (1) demands in the nature of unliquidated damages arising otherwise than by reason of a contract or promise shall not be provable in bankruptcy, and (2) no person having notice of any act of bankruptcy available for adjudication against the bankrupt shall prove for any debt or liability contracted by the bankrupt subsequently to the date of his so having notice (section 31).

5. The Court may, after adjudication, summon before it any person suspected of having in his possession any of the property or effects belonging to the bankrupt, and may require any such person to produce any document in his custody or power relating to the bankrupt, or his dealings or property, and may examine upon oath any person so brought before it (sections 96 and 97).

6. If any creditor in any bankruptcy, or liquidation by arrangement, or composition with creditors, in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, wilfully and with intent to defraud makes any false claims or any proof, declaration, or statement of account which is untrue in any material particular, he is guilty of misdemeanour by the 14th section of the Act for Abolishing Imprisonment for Debt (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62).

7. If a tenant becomes bankrupt his landlord may distress upon his goods or effects for the rent due to him; but any such distress, levied after the commencement of the bankruptcy, is to be available only for one year's rent accrued due prior to the adjudication, and the landlord must prove under the bankruptcy for the overplus for which the distress may not have been available (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 34).

8. If a person having privilege of Parliament commits an act of bankruptcy, he may be dealt with under the new Act in like manner as if he had not such privilege; and if he is a member of the House of Commons he is to be, during one year, incapable of sitting and voting in that House, unless, within that time, either the order is annulled or the creditors are satisfied. And if the order of adjudication is not annulled, and the debts of the bankrupt are not fully satisfied at the end of the year, the Speaker is to issue a writ to elect a new member in his place (sections 120—123).

9. When the Court is satisfied that the whole of the property of the bankrupt has been realised for the benefit of his creditors, or so much thereof as can be realised without needlessly protracting the bankruptcy, or that a composition or arrangement has been completed, it is to make an order that the bankruptcy has closed. And upon such order being made, or at any time with the assent of the creditors testified by a special resolution, the bankrupt may apply to the Court for an order of discharge (sections 47 and 48).

10. The declaration of dividends vests in the trustee, subject to the approval of the committee of inspection; and when the trustee has converted into money so much of the bankrupt's effects as can, in the joint opinion of himself and the committee of inspection, be realised without needlessly prolonging the bankruptcy, he is to declare a final dividend (sections 41 and 44).

11. When a person who has been made bankrupt does not obtain his discharge he is to be protected for three years from the close of the bankruptcy from having any debt provable under the bankruptcy enforced against his property; and if during that time he pays to his creditors such additional sum as will make up in the whole ten shillings in the pound, he is to become entitled to an order of discharge in the same manner as if a dividend of ten shillings in the pound had originally been paid out of his property; but if, at the expiration of the three years from the close of the bankruptcy, the bankrupt is still undischarged, the balances still remaining unpaid are to become judgment debts, which may be enforced against his property with the sanction of the Court, saving the rights of persons becoming creditors after the close of the bankruptcy (section 54).

12. The following settlements by a bankrupt trader are not void, though the bankruptcy is within two years from the date of the settlement:—

a A settlement made before and in consideration of marriage.

b A settlement made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration.

c A settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor, of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife (section 91).

13. A debtor desirous to compound with his creditors under the new Act, must present a petition in the form given in the 106th schedule to the orders of January, 1870, praying that notices to convene a general meeting of the creditors may be issued, and that any resolutions which may be passed by the creditors may be duly registered by the registrar of the court. He must then (unless prevented by some cause, such as sickness) be present at the creditors' meeting to answer inquiries, and produce a statement showing the whole of his assets and debts (section 126, and General Rules, rule 252).

14. The debtor is to produce to the first general meeting, and also (in case there be any) to the second general meeting, a statement showing the whole of his debts and assets, and the names and addresses of the creditors to whom such debts respectively are due. The name of each creditor in such statement is to be numbered consecutively, and the list of those creditors whose debts do not exceed £10, are to be separated and follow after the list of those creditors whose debts exceed that amount. The debtor's statement of affairs is to be as near as may be in the form required in bankruptcy (rule 274).

15. In calculating a majority for the purposes of a composition under part 7 of the Act, creditors whose debts amount to sums not exceeding £10 are to be reckoned in the majority in value, but not in the majority in number (section 126).

V.—CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES.

1. A conspiracy is the agreement between two or more persons to do an illegal act—as, for instance, to commit a crime.

2. No. Because a husband and wife cannot alone be found guilty of a conspiracy, for they are considered in law as one person, and are presumed to have but one will. Consequently, as the third person is acquitted, there can be no conviction for conspiracy, as there are not, in the eye of the law, two persons charged with that crime.

3. A conspiracy must be by two persons at least, but one person alone may be tried for a conspiracy, provided that the indictment charge him with conspiring with others who have not appeared, or who are since dead.

4. Yes. Because the essence of the crime of conspiracy is the mere agreement to do the illegal act which is the object of the conspiracy. An agreement between two or more to commit a crime is as much a crime in itself before as after the crime is committed in pursuance of the agreement.

5. A libel upon an individual is a defamation of him by writing, printing, or signs calculated to expose him to the hatred, contempt, or ridicule of others. It is necessary that the libel should be published. It need not be proved that it was malicious, because the law infers malice from the fact of the publication of such a defamatory statement. It is not necessary that anything criminally or morally wrong should be imputed to the person libelled. It is sufficient if what is imputed is defamatory. For instance, to write and publish of a man that he is a very stupid person would be prima facie libellous. Besides libels on individuals there are also blasphemous, seditious, and obscene libels.

6. Yes. A libeller can be prosecuted criminally for a libel, because it is considered that a libel tends directly to cause a breach of the peace, and is, therefore, a crime. The civil proceedings are to obtain compensation for the damage done by the libel, the criminal proceedings to preserve order in the state.

7. The rule of the common law is "the greater the truth the greater the libel" in a criminal prosecution, and the truth of the libel is, therefore, no defence in a criminal prosecution although it is a good defence in an action. This common law rule is now subject to the provision of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, by section 6 of which the truth of a libel is allowed to be a defence in a criminal prosecution if it was for the public benefit that the libel should be published. The fact that a libel was true, or believed to be true by the libeller, may sometimes, of course, affect the amount of punishment very much, even where it does not afford any defence.

8. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 44, enacts that whoever shall send, &c., knowing the contents thereof, any letter demanding of any person with menaces and without any reasonable or probable cause any property, chattel, money, &c., shall be guilty of felony and liable to penal servitude for life or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement.

9. Champerty (campi partitio) is a bargain with a plaintiff or a defendant campum partire to divide the land or other matter sued for, between them, if they prevail in law, whereupon the champertor is to carry on the party's suit at his own expense. It signifies the purchasing of a suit or the right of suing (4 Bla. Com. 135).

10. By section 24 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, any vendor of real or personal estate, or the solicitor of any such vendor, who shall after the passing of the Act conceal any settlement, deed, will, or other instrument material to the title from the purchaser, in order to induce him to accept the title offered to him, with intent to defraud, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall be liable to fine or imprisonment not exceeding two years with or without hard labour, or to both, and shall also be liable to an action for damages at the suit of the purchaser for any loss sustained by the purchaser in consequence of such concealment.

11. Ignorance of law does not excuse any one from punishment for the commission of a crime. The maxim is Ignorantia juris quod quisque scire tenetur neminem excusat. Such ignorance, however, although it is no defence to a criminal prosecution may affect the amount of punishment to be awarded to the offender. Ignorance of fact may be an excuse for the commission of a criminal act.

12 and 13. Infants, idiots, lunatics, and married women are under a more or less limited liability for their criminal acts.

An infant up to seven years of age is incapable of committing a crime. Between seven and fourteen years of age he is presumed to be doli in capax and so not liable for criminal acts, but evidence may be given to rebut this presumption and to show that in fact he is doli capax, and if this is proved he is liable as if of full age. After fourteen an infant becomes criminally liable as if of full age.

Idiots and lunatics are absolutely free from liability for criminal acts.

Married women are relieved from liability for criminal acts when done by coercion of their husbands, and if done in the presence of their husbands it is assumed, in the absence of contrary evidence, that the act is done by their coercion. Evidence may, however, be given to show that the wife, although acting in her husband's presence, was not under coercion, and if this is proved she is liable as if a feme sole. The mere authority or command of a husband to his wife to commit a crime will not excuse her if she commits it in his absence. It is not very well settled to what crimes this partial immunity of married women extends. It is said not to extend to treason, murder, or manslaughter, but it seems that it does extend to theft and burglary.

14 and 15. A principal in the first degree is one who is the actual perpetrator of the fact. Principals in the second degree are those who are present, aiding and abetting at the commission of the fact.

An accessory before the fact is he who, being absent at the time of the fact committed, doth yet procure, counsel, command, or abet another to commit it. An accessory after the fact is one who, knowing a felony to have been committed by another, receives, relieves, comforts or assists the felon.

There can only be accessories in felonies. In treasons and misdemeanours all are principals if guilty at all.

EXAMINATION AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

I.—FROM CHITTY ON CONTRACTS.

1. What are the different kinds of contracts?
2. What are the requisites of a deed?
3. To constitute the delivery of a deed as an escrow, to whom must it be delivered?
4. When a treaty is begun by letter, and an offer made by letter is verbally rejected, is the party making the offer discharged from his written offer?
5. Is a promise to forbear "for a little time" sufficient to constitute a good consideration for a contract?
6. Is it requisite that a person who makes a promise in consideration of forbearance to a third party should have an interest in the transaction?
7. What is the distinction between a good and a valuable consideration?

II.—FROM WILLIAMS ON THE PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

8. Define the legal meaning of the word "purchase" as contradistinguished from descent, and to what tenure is it applicable?
9. What is the first rule of descent? From whom must it now be traced?
10. When do female descendants inherit, and why were they, and are they postponed to males of equal degree?
11. What are co-parteners of an estate; and when there are three or more, will the law oblige them to make partition if one should require it?
12. Can a kinsman of the half-blood inherit when the common ancestor is a male, or a female; and after whom in degree can he succeed?
13. Define the meaning of a "manor," and explain its origin. How are lands held in it by the lord's tenants?
14. What are customary freeholds; and are they held at the will of the lord; and do these last words import an absolute, or a limited right of dominion?

III.—FROM J. W. SMITH'S MANUAL OF EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE.

15. Give some illustrations of the maxim "Equity looks on a thing as done which ought to be done."
16. What is the distinction between actual fraud and constructive fraud?
17. State some of the instances in which the Court of Chancery will exercise its jurisdiction over infants.
18. Define a special injunction, and how is it obtained?
19. What redress is there in equity against a party who has contracted to do a thing, and has not done it; and in what cases will equity refuse to interfere?
20. Under what circumstances will equity interfere in cases of parol contracts only?
21. State the principles followed by the Court of Chancery in reference to profit or loss made by trustees in administering or dealing with trust funds.

IV.—BOOK KEEPING.

22. An account has two sides, a Dr. side and a Cr. side. Say what these two sides are intended to contain.

23. How should you keep a constituent's account?

24. What ought the account at any time to shew?

25. What are the principal books of account which ought to be kept?

26. Of what items should a balance sheet be composed; and of what ought the difference between the Dr. and Cr. side to consist?

ADMISSION OF ATTORNEYS.

EASTER TERM, 1870.

The following are the days for admission in Common Law:—

Wednesday.....May 11 | Thursday May 12

ADMISSION OF SOLICITORS.

The Master of the Rolls has appointed Thursday, the 12th of May, 1870, at the Rolls Court, Chancery-lane, at four o'clock in the afternoon, for swearing in solicitors.

Every person desirous of being sworn in on the above day must leave his common law admission or his certificate of practice for the current year at the secretary's office, Rolls-yard, Chancery-lane, on or before Wednesday, the 11th of May.

The papers of those gentlemen who cannot be admitted at common law till the last day of Term will be received at the secretary's office up to twelve o'clock at noon on that day, after which time no papers can be received.

LECTURES AND LAW CLASSES AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Mr. H. M. BOMPAS, Lecturer and Reader on Common Law and Mercantile Law—Monday, May 2, class A. Tuesday, May 3, class B. Wednesday, May 4, class C.—4.30 to 6 p.m.

Friday, May 6, lecture—6 to 7 p.m.

THE REAL ESTATES INTESTACY BILL.

But with regard to the descent of estates in fee simple where undisposed of by settlement or will, I have long been of opinion that an alteration in the law of primogeniture would be beneficial. And I have expressed this opinion in my published works.* An estate in fee simple is an estate given to a man and his heirs. In ancient times these words were pregnant with meaning. The heir had a vested right of succession, of which the ancestor could not deprive him by any alienation, whether by deed or will. The eldest son was the heir-at-law, because he was supposed to be stronger and more competent to bear arms than his younger brothers.† This reason, I need hardly say, has long since ceased. Full power of alienation has been gradually acquired. The words "to him and his heirs" are now mere technicalities. The necessity for their use was abolished, as to wills, by one of the first Acts of the present reign.‡ But in deeds they must still be used; and to them cling masses of feudal rubbish, such as the rule in Shelley's case, all of which might most beneficially be weeded out of the law. I should like to uproot this ancient definition, and with it the last remaining trace of its feudal origin—the descent on intestacy to the eldest son.

And my reasons are these:—Granted that the testamentary power is beneficial, it seems to me to follow that, where by accident this power has not been exercised, the law should make, as nearly as may be, the same disposition as a wise testator would have made for himself. I think that the more this matter is considered, the more this will be found to be the true principle. When lunacy or idiocy render a will impossible, surely the law should make some approach to a reasonable provision for all the children, and should rather mitigate the misfortunes of the family by an equitable apportionment, than abide by a feudal rule, however great its antiquity or historical interest. Intestacy occurs far more frequently with respect to small properties than large ones; and in these cases the wisest disposition would most frequently be, a sale of the property, and the division of the proceeds in due proportions between the wife and children—in fact the same or nearly the same division as is made of the personal estate by the Statute of Distribution. We have seen that the Court of Chancery, anticipating, as the courts have often done, the tardy current of legislation, has in some cases already produced this effect. But if the share of a trader in lands, purchased for the purposes of a partnership business, is in equity personal estate, why should ground or warehouses, which a man trading alone has bought for the purposes of his business, be still bound by an old feudal rule, the reason of which has long since ceased?

Lands held for long terms of years exist in many parts of the country. For all practical purposes they are the same as freeholds. And yet on intestacy they do not descend to the heir, but vest in the administrator in trust for the next of kin. I never heard of any injurious consequence arising from this state of the law. If all lands were vested in the administrator, there would, no doubt, be a great temptation to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to subject them to administration and legacy duty. But such taxes, if imposed, would at least have the merit of simplicity, a merit which, unfortunately, cannot be claimed by the duty on successions to real estate.

It may be said that many persons would by their wills leave their real estate to their eldest son, leaving their personality only amongst their younger children. But in practice it is found that, when the real estate is deliberately destined to the eldest son, it is almost always charged with some moderate provision for the younger children. Such a provision it would be very difficult to make in case of intestacy. And where it is impossible to meet every case, it seems to me that legislation should be aimed at those cases which most frequently occur. Intestacy very seldom occurs as to large properties. They are generally carefully settled in a manner suited to the circumstances of the family. There is one exception, however, which I think might well be made and which seems to me to follow from the principle of doing that by law which a prudent testator would himself have most probably done had he left a will. As long as we have in this country descendible titles of honour, so long is it most desirable that a sufficient estate should accompany each title, to enable the heir to maintain the dignity which has, by no act of his own, descended upon him. As the law now stands, on the decease intestate of a peer or a baronet, the title may go to the next heir male, and the lands to the next heir general, such as an only daughter. I think that the same policy which creates these distinctions should endeavour to preserve them, so far as may be done without infringing on the right of alienation. It appears to me, therefore, that, on the decease intestate of a person possessed of a hereditary title, his real estate should descend with the title to the next heir thereto, but charged, if you please, with a provision—say to the extent of one-fourth of the value of the lands, in favour of his next of kin.

I think that a sale of the real estate of an intestate, and the division of the produce, is far more desirable than a division of the lands themselves amongst the children. I believe the perpetual subdivision of land, except where made for building or like purposes, to be very harmful. I believe that, except perhaps in very mountainous countries, capital is most productively applied to land in large than in very small farms. A sale effects the fairest partition. If all agree, it need not be made; and if made, any one or more may, by purchasing the lands, retain them in the family. No doubt there are cases, such as the infancy of all the children, where this course would be impracticable. And it might perhaps be more prudent, in introducing so great and fundamental an alteration, to pursue at first a tentative course, and to make it optional to every purchaser of landed property to have it at his decease treated either as real or as personal property. A scheme for this purpose has been put forth by my learned friend, Mr. F. Vaughan Hawkins, in an able paper on the "Optional Mobilisation of Land."* I think that his suggestions are well worth attention. If it were found that the great majority of purchasers availed themselves of this provision in order to avoid the rule of primogeniture, that rule might ultimately be made the exception, or perhaps abolished altogether. Meanwhile, I must confess it seems difficult to imagine any fair ground of opposition to a plan which would be simply permissive, and which would enable the landowner more effectually to destine his property in a way which he himself may conceive to be the most equitable.

The chief objection to the plan of optional mobilization is, that it would tend to complicate the law by the addition of another class of property. The enormous extent and ramifications of our law are very little appreciated by the public at large, who suppose that any lawyer of any eminence must know all about it. This I believe to be not only untrue but impossible. I sincerely trust that no changes are in contemplation which may render more frequent the painful spectacle of a judge in the false position of having to decide points of law with which he is of necessity unfamiliar.

But to return to our subject. I think that on the decease of a married woman, her lands ought not to belong wholly to her husband, as her personal estate now does. In this respect, however, I should suggest an amendment in the law of personal property. In ancient times it might have been reasonable that the wife's goods and chattels should belong entirely to her husband. They then consisted principally of those brass pots, spinning-wheels, and four-post bedsteads, of which specimens are still to be seen in the collections of the curious. But at the present day the case is different. When especially the wife has property for her separate use, the right of the husband to claim the whole on her decease intestate, is generally contrary to what is intended, and produces accordingly surprise and disappointment. I think that if, on the wife's decease, the husband had the same share in his wife's personal estate as she now has in his, the law would be more just; and the same rule might then apply to the proceeds of the real estate as well as to the personality. If this were done I should propose to abolish altogether the husband's estate by the curtesy after his wife's decease. And I do not think that estates tail, which are now subject to curtesy, need form any exception.

If one were framing a code of laws, the fact of the husband having had issue born alive would scarcely be selected as the most suitable event on which to give him an estate for life in his wife's lands; and I cannot remember ever having seen such a provision deliberately inserted in any settlement. I think that during the coverture the husband, as the head of the household, should be entitled as now to the rents and profits of his wife's lands. But after her decease, I think that, in default of any express stipulation, she ought to be able to dispose of her lands by her will, giving them as she pleases, either to her husband absolutely, or to any one else.

As the law now stands, the real estate of a married woman descends, subject to her husband's curtesy, to her heir-at-law, unaffected by any disposition which she may have attempted to make by her will. Nor can she defeat the right of her heir by any disposition she may make by deed, unless such deed be executed with her husband's concurrence, and be also acknowledged by her apart from him, as her own act and deed, before a judge or two commissioners. I think that the law may be beneficially altered in both these respects. I see no reason, as I have said, why a married woman should be unable to dispose of her lands by will; and, although the principle of the separate acknowledgment of deeds by married women may, perhaps, find defenders in the profession, yet in practice it is undoubtedly true that no lawyer ever deliberately places the lands of a married woman within the protection which the law thus provides; but, on the contrary, in every settlement where a power of disposition is given to the wife, it is carefully so framed as to avoid the necessity of a separate acknowledgment by her. I think that a system condemned by the universal practice of the profession had much better be abolished. I think that every married woman, with the concurrence of her husband, should have power to dispose of her real estate by a deed simply executed in the usual way. I have before called attention to the need of this reform.* I am glad to find the same views expressed in an able paper on the property rights of married women, lately read before the Juridical Society by my learned friend, Mr. Droop.*

On the decease of a husband intestate, his widow's right of dower still intervenes as against the heir. This old-fashioned right was well adapted to the times in which it originated. But so troublesome had it become in modern times, that the Act for the Amendment of the Law relating to Dower,† enabled every future husband to deprive his wife of this provision by any deed executed by him, or by his will. The remarkable unanimity with which all purchasers of lands have availed themselves of this provision shows how little this right is relied on as a practical provision for the widow. And in truth it would be very difficult to set out by metes and bounds one-third of a dwelling-house for the exclusive use of the widow for the rest of her life; and what use could she make of a life estate in a portion of a piece of building ground? I think that this right had very much better be abolished. One-third or one-half, as the case may be, of the proceeds of the sale of the land would not, I should hope, be regarded by those most concerned as an unhandsome offer in exchange.

According to the present law, lands do not descend to the heir of the last possessor, but to the heir of the last purchaser. So that if an only son has inherited lands from his mother, the heir of his mother, however distant, is preferred to his father; and, in other cases, the heir of the father, however distant, comes in before the mother. This may be feudally right, but I venture to think that it is naturally wrong. If the alterations for which I contend were made, the next of kin of the last possessor would, on his death without issue, always take the produce of his landed property; the father, if living, taking the whole, or, if he were dead, the mother, brothers, and sisters sharing equally.

By the old law of descent, in default of issue, relations of the half blood could never inherit. When this law was—with the law of dower and other laws,—amended at the suggestion of Lord Brougham's Real Property Commission, the half blood were permitted to inherit; and their true place was, I think, assigned to them, namely, next after those of the same degree of the whole blood. This position I should not wish to disturb. I had rather alter the Statute of Distribution, by postponing the half to the whole blood in the succession to personal estate, instead of permitting all to share equally as is now the case. This suggestion also I have made before.‡ I do not think that a half brother or sister has the same claim as a brother or sister of the whole blood. Unquestionably the relationship is less.

There is another point in which I think that a beneficial change might be made in the distribution of the proceeds of an intestate's estate. I do not think that very distant relatives need be sought for at great trouble and expense. I should suggest that in the event of intestacy, there would be no occasion to go beyond the uncles and aunts of the intestate, and their descendants. Beyond these limits there is usually very little of that intimacy which raises an expectation of some provision. I should suggest that beyond these limits the property of an intestate should go to the Crown for the benefit of the whole of the intestate's countrymen, rather than to the few who may be able to trace a kinship to him. This suggestion I have made before.§ A similar proposal has been made by Mr. Mill in the first volume of his "Political Economy."¶

The change which I advocate in the law of descent would involve some important consequences, all of which require consideration. Two of them are of especial importance; namely, first, the placing in the same hand of both the real and personal estate of an intestate, with a view to the payment of his debts. There was a time when Sir Samuel Romilly's proposal to subject a man's real estate to the payment of his simple contract debts was denounced as subversive of the constitution. Those times are happily past. But the want of fit machinery for the realisation of the landed property of a deceased debtor is an evil still practically felt. I think that the whole of the estate of every deceased person should vest first in his executor or administrator for payment of his debts, with similar powers to those now possessed, subject, perhaps, to a few modifications.

The second important consequence would be an improvement in a branch of the law, which, in my view, of all others most needs to be improved, namely, the law of mortgage. It seems to me monstrous that the pedigree of the lender's heir should, for sixty years, become a part of the borrower's title, because the lender, after the loan, may happen to die intestate. The mortgagor now hands over the lands bodily to the mortgagee; and at law he is the owner, and to his heir descends what is called the legal estate. I heartily wish this legal estate were abolished. I have known a person obliged to put up for years with a lease, improperly obtained from his predecessor in title, simply because, having been obliged to borrow, he was unable himself to bring an ejectment, and his mortgagees, of course, declined the responsibility. I think that every mortgage should be at law what it is in equity—a charge and nothing more, not interfering, unless it be realised, with the ownership of the mortgaged lands. This change, if effected, would no doubt supersede the advantage to be derived, in this case, from a change in the law of descent.

It may be said that other consequences not so beneficial may perhaps follow from the change I propose. It may, possibly be that those who have no lands may think this change will tend to their benefit, and finding that it does not will be disappointed. But it is, of course, mainly in the interest of those who are possessed of landed property, that I propose a change in the laws relating to such property. Those who have none should be, and I hope and believe increasingly are, the objects of anxious consideration on the part of the Legislature. But the particular subject which I have been discussing cannot, so far as I can see, materially affect them either one way or the other.

OBITUARY.

* * The death of Mr. John Endell Powles, solicitor, of Monmouth, was erroneously announced in our last week's obituary. We were betrayed into the mistake, which we regret extremely, in consequence of a Mr. Alderman John Powles (who died on the date mentioned by us) having been described as Mr. J. E. Powles. We are glad to find that Mr. John Endell Powles is in perfect health, and trust it may be many years before he becomes entitled to a place in our obituary columns.

SIR C. G. PAYNE, BART.

The death of Sir Charles Gillies Payne, Bart., barrister-at-law, took place at Blumham House, his seat in Bedfordshire, on the 21st of April, at the age of seventy-seven years. The deceased baronet was the eldest son of the late Sir Peter Payne, who assumed the title in 1828. Sir Charles succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of his father, in January, 1843. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1815, and M.A. in 1818; he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1823. In 1833, during his residence at St. Christopher's, in the West Indies (where there are family estates), he was appointed a member of the Executive and Legislative Councils of the island. He filled the office of High Sheriff of Bedfordshire in 1851, and was nominated a deputy-lieutenant of that county in 1852; for many years he was chairman of the justices of the Biggleswade division. By the death of Sir Charles, the baronetcy devolves on his only son, Salisbury Gillies Payne, barrister-at-law, of the Norfolk Circuit. Sir Salisbury Payne was born at St. Christopher's in April, 1829, he was educated at Rugby, and afterwards at Brasenose College, Oxford, having been called to the bar at the Middle Temple in November, 1857.

MR. T. J. KNIGHT.

Mr. Thomas John Knight, barrister-at-law, died suddenly on the 25th April, at his residence at Richmond, Surrey. The late Mr. Knight was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1828, and afterwards proceeded M.A.; he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in November, 1831, and practised for some years at Hobart Town. He subsequently became Solicitor-General, and afterwards Attorney-General, for the island of Tasmania, which latter office he resigned in 1861, when he returned to England.

MR. E. LLOYD.

Among the party recently captured by Greek brigands on the field of Marathon, and afterwards murdered, was Mr. Edward Lloyd, barrister-at-law. He was a son of Mr. E. J. Lloyd, Q.C., Judge of the Bristol County Court, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in June, 1858; he had visited Greece on business connected with the Piræus Railway. Mr. Lloyd was for some time on the staff of the Jurist and Weekly Reporter. He was the author of a very well known work on "The Law of Trade Marks," which appeared originally as a series of articles in the Solicitors' Journal.

MR. G. R. MOSSMAN, SEN.

We have to record the death of Mr. George Robert Mossman, sen., solicitor, of Bradford, which took place at that town on the 26th of April. Mr. Mossman was the oldest solicitor in Bradford, having taken out his certificate in Hilary Term, 1820, and had therefore been in practice for nearly fifty years. About forty years of that period he held the office of clerk to the West Riding Justices acting for the east division of Morley, which becomes vacant by his death. The deceased gentleman, who had reached his seventy-fifth year, was a member of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association. His son, Mr. G. R. Mossman, is clerk to the borough justices of Bradford.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

Proceedings at the Twenty-third annual general meeting, held at the Incorporated Law Society's Hall, on Wednesday, April 27th, 1870, Mr. Edward Lawrance, in the chair.

The secretary read the report and the annual balance sheet.

Resolved—1. On the motion of the Chairman: That the report of the committee of management be adopted, and that it be printed and circulated in the usual way.

Resolved—2. On the motion of Mr. J. Kendall, seconded by Mr. Dodds, M.P.: That the cordial thanks of the association be presented to the committee of management for their labours during the past year.

Resolved—3. On the motion of Mr. Dodds, M.P., seconded by Mr. John Hopgood: That the members of the association (page 3 of the report) be elected chairman, deputy chairman, and members of the committee of management for the ensuing year.

Resolved—4. On the motion of Mr. Stephen Williams, seconded by Mr. B. T. Sharpe, of Norwich: That the best thanks of the association be presented to Mr. J. Morris for his services as auditor, and that he be requested to accept the same office for the ensuing year.

Resolved—5. On the motion of Mr. E. Benham, seconded by Mr. W. H. Partington, of Manchester: That the best thanks of the association be presented to the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, for the cordial co-operation they have afforded to the committee of management during the past year, and for their courtesy in lending one of their rooms for the purpose of this meeting.

Resolved—6. On the motion of Mr. T. Arison, of Liverpool, seconded by Mr. C. F. Tagart: That the best thanks of this meeting be presented to Mr. Edward Lawrance for his services during the past year, and for his able conduct in the chair this day.

The meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the secretary, which was moved by Mr. Edward Lawrance, the chairman, and seconded by Mr. E. Benham.

SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The twenty-fourth half-yearly general meeting of the members and friends of the above association, established in 1858, for the relief of poor and necessitous attorneys, solicitors, and proctors throughout England and Wales, and their wives, widows, and families, was held in the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, on Wednesday last, the 27th inst., in the presence of a good number of the profession, for the purpose of receiving the directors' report and statement of accounts for the past half-year and transacting other business. The chair was occupied by W. Strickland Cookson, Esq.

The SECRETARY having read the notice of meeting, and the minutes of the last half-yearly general meeting, the following report was received and adopted:—

The termination of another half-year, renders it the duty of the board of directors, in conformity with the rules, again to address the general body of members as to the affairs of the association, and they have much pleasure in being enabled to report its increasing prosperity.

The number of new members admitted since October last is 95, of whom 22 are life and 73 annual members. The aggregate number now enrolled is 2,080, of whom 721 are life and 1,359 annual subscribers; 23 life members are also annual subscribers.

The general circulation of the society's printed reports amongst the members of the profession has materially assisted in producing this accession of new members, and the directors deem it necessary to mention the fact, not only as a subject for congratulation, but because the outlay incurred in this mode of bringing the objects and claims of the institution under the notice of the profession has been considerable.

The usual audited abstract of the accounts is appended, from which it will be seen that the receipts during the half-year, including the balance of £232 18s. 10d. from the previous account, have amounted to £1,550 8s. 7d.

During the half-year, the sum of £385 has been expended in relief; of that amount the sum of £230 has been applied in grants of assistance to distressed members and families of deceased members, and £155 in alleviating the necessities of families of deceased solicitors, non-members of the association.

The sum of £650 has been added to the invested fund in the purchase of India Four per Cents., and the funded capital of the association now consists of £4,338 10s. India Four per Cents., £7,803 17s. 8d. India Five per Cents., and £5,071 6s. 4d. Three per Cent. Consols, producing together annual dividends amounting to £700.

Observations having been addressed to the board on the small amount of relief granted, the directors desire to point out that, in accordance with a resolution passed by the general meeting in April, 1861, and re-affirmed by another meeting in October, 1862, they are restricted from giving relief beyond the amount of the annual dividends.

A balance of £235 2s. 10d. remains to the credit of the association with the Union Bank of London, and a sum of £15 is in the secretary's hands.

The directors deeply regret to have to record the decease, since the last general meeting, of two of their valued colleagues—Mr. Francis Hoole, of Sheffield, and Mr. Thomas Harrison, of London—both of whom were trustees. The vacancies at the board have been filled by the appointment of Mr. John Yeomans, town clerk of Sheffield, and Mr. William Hine Haycock, of London. The complement of trustees will have to be filled up, in conformity with the rules, at the next provincial general meeting.

The directors have the gratification to announce that the Vice-Chancellor, the Hon. Sir Richard Malins, has kindly accepted their invitation to preside at the tenth anniversary festival of the association, which will take place on Wednesday, the 15th of June next, at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, London. Seventy-nine gentlemen have already taken upon them the office of stewards, and the secretary will be happy to receive other names. The directors confidently trust that by hearty and general co-operation among the friends of the association, its interests may be greatly promoted on that occasion.

The usual complimentary votes were then passed to the directors and auditors for their valuable services during the past half-year, to the council of the Incorporated Law Society for permitting the meetings of the association to be held in their hall, to the chairman for presiding, and the secretary, and the proceedings of the meeting terminated.

LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.

A meeting of the Law Amendment Society will be held on Monday next, when will be considered—"The High Court of Justice and the Appellate Jurisdiction Bills." G. W. Hastings, Esq., will open the discussion. The chair will be taken at eight o'clock by George Malliah, Esq., Q.C. A meeting of the Law Amendment Committee will meet at seven o'clock.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society held on Tuesday, the 26th of April, the question for discussion was No. CLXXVI. Jurisprudential—"Should the game laws be abolished?" Mr. Drake opened the debate in the negative, and the question was ultimately decided in that way by a large majority.

COURT PAPERS.

BRISTOL ELECTION PETITION.

Britt and Others, Petitioners; E. S. Robinson, M.P., Respondent.

An election petition from Bristol against the return of Mr. Robinson was lodged last Friday week at the Common Pleas Rule Office. The petition alleges bribery, treating, and gross personation of voters at the election, and prays that the election may be declared void.

Mr. Baron Bramwell will be the judge to try the petition. The agent for petitioners is Mr. T. Gilbert, of 4, Victoria-street, Westminster; the agents for respondent are Messrs. Wyatt & Hoskins, of 24, Parliament-street.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The week opened with Consols decidedly strong in spite of a brisk demand for money. They have not, however, maintained their tone, and hang rather heavy just now, but the relapse appears to be due to merely temporary influences. Railways, which at one period in the week showed an improvement, have also relapsed, and the prevailing uncertainty as to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer will do with the duty, has a depressing influence. Great Westerns have made a slight further advance. Eries have receded somewhat, the accounts from New York not being very encouraging. The Indian guaranteed stocks remain without alteration, at the improvement effected a short while back. The new Japanese 9 per cent. loan has been very well received, the subscriptions being nearly double the amount to be allotted.

The twenty-first annual meeting of the Prudential Assurance Company was held on the 22nd inst. The report states that the new annual premiums for the year 1869 amounted to £102,323, and the claims paid to £86,594. The usual interest on the shares, at the rate of 5 per cent. is now payable.

The annual meeting of the London and Provincial Law Assurance Society was held on Wednesday. The report states that the new business during the year amounted to 197 policies, assuring £289,970, and yielding £10,849 in premiums. The total premium receipts reached £83,747, and the interest on the investments £22,779 11s., making the total income of the twelve months £106,526, as against £97,937, the income of the previous year; the sum of £5,668, was also received in respect of annuities granted. Claims have been paid upon the deaths of twenty-two lives, assured under thirty-one policies, in the aggregate sum of £34,786, including bonus additions of £3,386; of this sum £2,580 was covered by re-assurances, thus reducing the payments by the society on this head to £32, 206.

Lord and Lady Cairns have arrived in Paris, on their way back to England.

The death is announced of the Hon. Mrs. Isabella Sophia Whately, sister of Lord Chancellor Cottenham.

Mr. R. S. Sowler, Q.C., met with an accident recently, by which his leg was broken, while getting out of his car at Ellerswhaithe, on his way to the Windermere railway station.

Mr. J. A. Russell, Q.C., Judge of the Manchester County Court, has been requested to accept the office of President of the Manchester and Salford Court of Conciliation and Arbitration, in the room of Mr. Alfred Milne.

Mrs. Western Wood, a sister-in-law of the Lord Chancellor, died at North Cray-place, Kent, on the 24th of April. The deceased lady was the youngest daughter of Mr. John Morris, of Baker-street, and relict of the late Western Wood, Esq., younger brother of Lord Hatherley, who was for some time M.P. for the city of London, and died in 1863.

On Thursday Mr. Justice Blackburn made absolute a rule to restore Mr. Frederick Augustus Farrar to the roll of attorneys. It may be remembered that Mr. Farrar was convicted of forgery in October, 1868, after which it was a matter of course that he should be struck off the rolls. Subsequently the Home Office discovered that he had been wrongfully convicted, and he consequently received a free pardon. Mr. Justice Blackburn, having satisfied himself that the pardon was granted ex debito justitiæ on the merits of the case, made the rule absolute to restore Mr. Farrar to the roll.

In a late case of Demott v. McMullen, the Superior Court of New York held that necessities purchased by a married woman are not chargeable upon her separate estate, unless perhaps purchased expressly on the credit of it, and charged upon it by some affirmative act on her part sufficient in law for that purpose. In passing the Act of 1860, the Legislature could not have intended to make the separate estate of a married woman liable for necessities purchased by the husband through the agency of his wife, although the statute says so. The Legislature probably intended to enact that the separate estate of a married woman may be held liable for a debt contracted for the support of herself or her children by her husband as her agent. Before a plaintiff can, in any event, be permitted to collect the husband's debt out of the wife's property under the first section of the Act of 1860, as it reads, he must bring himself within the strict letter of it and show that the debt was contracted for the exclusive support of the wife or her children.—New York Daily Transcript.

LONDON AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSURANCE SOCIETY.—At the annual meeting of this society on Wednesday, Mr. George Lake, of the firm of Messrs. Lake & Co., and Mr. Henry H. Burne, of Bath, were elected directors.

SIR BARNES PEACOCK.—The Indian telegraph informs us that Sir Barnes Peacock, Chief Justice of the High Court of Calcutta, left for England by the mail-steamer on the 26th of April, his successor, Sir Richard Couch, having arrived from Bombay on the previous day. Sir Barnes Peacock was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in January 1836, and formerly practised on the Home Circuit. He was created a Queen's Counsel in 1860, and in 1862 was appointed legal member of the Supreme Council of India. In 1869 he was nominated to succeed Sir James Colville as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Calcutta, and was appointed Vice-President of the Legislative Council of India. He received a fresh appointment to the Calcutta Bench in 1862, as Chief Justice of the newly-established High Court of Judicature. After serving in India for eighteen years, he now retires on a pension, and will most probably, like his predecessors, be added to the Privy Council on his return to England.

YANKEE NEWS.

The German lawyers of New York city have formed themselves into a Legal Aid Society, the object of which is to aid poor Germans lacking the necessary knowledge of the language and laws of the country in law cases.

Mrs. E. Morris, the female occupant of the judicial bench in Wyoming, is described as married; about sixty years of age; more fat than fair, and a believer in spiritualism, and a different organisation of our social as well as our political system.

A Dogberry in Mississippi has made a funny decision. Two negroes, near Rolling Fork, in Issaquena county, had a difficulty, and it resulted in their attendance before a magistrate in the neighbourhood. After a hearing, the justice decided that both men were in fault, and that each should pay a fine of twenty-five dollars and costs, making forty-eight dollars each. But both were unable to pay. The embarrassed squire finally hit upon a plan to get even with them. He put both to work on his forty-acre cotton-patch, and they picked eighteen hundred pounds each to square the bill.—Albany Law Journal.

Mrs. Caroline Neil is now a Judge of the Court of Oyer and Terminer at Wyoming.—Anglo-American Times.

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, MAY 7, 1870.

WE NOTICED A FEW WEEKS AGO* a case of Guest v. Smythe, in which the Master of the Rolls made an order setting aside a purchase made by a solicitor at a sale in a foreclosure suit, and directing the property to be resold. The case was subsequently reported (18 W. R. 617). Lord Justice Giffard has this week reversed the above decision. The facts, as may be remembered, were rather peculiar. The solicitor who purchased was not concerned for any of the parties to the suit in which the sale was made; he had neither been concerned in nor consulted about the preparation of the particulars, and did not even know what was the reserve price which had been fixed on, and which was below the price at which he himself purchased. His name, however, had been without his knowledge placed upon the particulars as a reference for information. The only other connection which he had with the foreclosure suit was that he was concerned in an administration suit instituted by creditors of the mortgagee, and had the day before the day of the sale taken out on behalf of his client a summons for leave to attend the proceedings, but the order on this summons was not drawn up until after the sale. The decision of the Lord Justice does not in any way trench on the principles laid down in cases such as Hamilton v. Wright (9 Cl. & F. 123); Re Bloye's Trusts (1 MoN. & G. 497); the recent case of Tennant v. Trenchard (L. R. 4 Ch. 547), and many others, upon which interested parties, or persons in a fiduciary position, or the solicitors of such individuals, are precluded from becoming purchasers. The Lord Justice considered that on the facts of the present case the client could have bid, and therefore there was no reason why the solicitor should not do so. The Master of the Rolls, on the contrary, had considered that a duty was cast on this solicitor's client of promoting, so far as he took any part in the matter, the best price. The difference between the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Justice then, is that the latter considers the connection between a creditor of the mortgagee suing in an administration suit and the sale under the mortgagee's foreclosure suit, too remote to be taken into account by the Court.

The Lord Justice also lays it down that the mere appearance of a solicitor's name on the particulars is not of itself enough to disqualify him for purchasing.

THE JUDICATURE COMMISSION are said to have in preparation a bill for the consolidation of all the statutes relating to county courts. These statutes number nearly twenty, and the complications arising out of the numerous clauses, which repeat other clauses and parts of clauses, are sources of so much difficulty in practice that it is altogether unsafe for any but regular county court practitioners to advise on any matter of detail. The rules of practice, the construction of which is a frequent cause of contention, are also to be remodelled. It is improbable, of course, that any consolidating bill can be passed this session.

IN "CHITTY ON PLEADING" and in "Lush's Practice" it is laid down that a broker who has entered into a contract in that capacity is entitled to maintain an action in his own name on such contract. These dicta, after the recent judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Fairlie v. Fenton (18 W. R. 700) cannot be entirely relied upon. In Fairlie v. Fenton the sale note on which the plaintiff sued was to this effect: "I have this day sold you (defendants) on account of X. Y. a hundred bales of cotton, etc. (Signed) Evelyn Fairlie (broker)." This note in the "I have" differs from the ordinary form of sale note, which runs, "Sold on account," but the Court were unanimously of opinion that, having disclosed his principal and not having personally bound himself, the broker could neither be sued nor sue upon it. The Court pointed out that the true distinction, apparently recognised but not followed by the text-writers referred to, in the capacity to sue and be sued, between a broker on the one hand and such agents as auctioneers and factors on the other hand, lies in the fact that the latter have a special property or lien in the goods themselves the subjects of agreement, whereas a broker has no interest in the subject-matter of a contract in which he intervenes, beyond the brokerage or commission which he earns for simply bringing vendor and purchaser together.

MR. C. FORSTER'S BILL "to abolish forfeitures for treason and felony, and to otherwise amend the law relating thereto," has passed through the select committee in the House of Commons. It consists of thirty-one sections, and its general scheme is to abolish forfeitures of all kinds for treason and felony, to render persons guilty of these crimes liable to pay the costs of their own prosecutions, and in the case of felony to pay compensation to persons aggrieved by the felony. Also, in certain cases, to vest the property of the convict in an administrator who is to have the whole management of the property until the convict shall die, or become bankrupt, or have undergone his punishment.

The Act only deals with treason and felony. By section 1 attainder, corruption of blood, forfeiture, and escheat for treason or felony is abolished, but the Act is not to affect the law of forfeiture consequent on outlawry. Conviction (section 2) is to be a disqualification for holding any of many specified public offices, and (section 3) the Court which pronounces judgment for treason or felony may, in addition to its sentence, condemn the criminal to pay the costs and expenses of the prosecution. By section 4 the Court may, upon application of the person aggrieved after a conviction for felony, award any sum not exceeding £100 by way of compensation for any loss of property suffered by the applicant by means of the felony. Section 6 and the following sections deal with the management of the property of "convicts"—i.e., of persons against whom judgment of death or penal servitude has been pronounced, or recorded upon any charge of treason or felony. Administrators may be appointed by the Crown, who are to have the entire management of the property, the convict being unable to sue for, alienate, or otherwise deal with it. These administrators are (section 14) to pay the convict's debts and liabilities, and may make compensation to persons injured by his criminal or fraudulent acts, and may also make allowances to the convict's relatives or to the convict himself. Subject to these payments the property is to be preserved for the convict, and to revert to him when he has undergone his sentence, or in his personal representatives on his death. If no administrator is appointed an interim curator may (section 21) be appointed by justices, who is to have powers somewhat similar to those of the administrators.

The general scope of this bill, and the way in which it carefully excludes all cases of misdemeanour from its provisions, is a good example of the timid and hesitating character of our legislation. The provisions of section 4 show this very clearly. It allows (extending a little the principle of section 100 of 24 & 25 Vict. c.

96, and section 9 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35) compensation to be awarded after conviction to the person aggrieved. The principle of this section—viz., to save the delay and expense of another proceeding for the proof of the same facts—is undoubtedly good, but why should the scope of the section be so limited? It only extends to loss of property caused by felony, and the compensation is limited to £100. If the section ought to become law, it ought to have a much wider application. There is no reason why a person deprived of property by a misdemeanor should be in a worse position than one who has lost a similar amount by a felony; there is no reason why there should be a fixed limit to the amount of compensation, no regard being paid to the surrounding circumstances; and it may well be doubted whether there is any reason for giving a more summary remedy for injury to property than to injury to person or reputation.

This bill is not worse than most other bills that are introduced into Parliament for the improvement of the law, but it is no better. Indeed, the only idea that is thoroughly carried out in the thirty-one sections, is the abolition of attainder, forfeiture, and escheat, which is done in the first three lines of the bill.

THE AMENDED HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE BILL.

The High Court of Justice Bill has appeared in its amended form, but the committee thereon in the House of Lords has been deferred to give the law peers an opportunity of considering the amendments introduced by the Lord Chancellor. These amendments may be reduced to three heads. The rules laid down in the Act to govern and control the rules to be hereafter framed under the authority of the Act have been enlarged and extended; the power of making such further rules has been taken away from the High Court and vested in a new Committee of the Privy Council, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and such other Privy Counsellors as her Majesty may appoint, i.e., has been transferred from the judicial body to the executive government; and the projected abolition of the Home Circuit has been practically abandoned. The other alterations are purely verbal, and none of them seem to us of sufficient importance to deserve special notice, except that an alteration has been made in the 7th section which gets rid of the contradiction we formerly noticed in the language of the two bills with respect to the scale of precedence as between the judges of this court and those of the appellate court, and finally determining the precedence to be, after the Master of the Rolls, the Lords Presidents of Divisional Courts, then the ordinary judges of appeal, then the judges of the High Court of Justice.

The first of the alterations we have specially noticed is contained in the 13th and 14th sections of the amended bill. These sections are entirely new (except the 1st clause of section 14), and seem to us of great importance, because, if the rules therein laid down are fairly carried out, in the spirit and not in the letter, the rules of court to be hereafter made are reduced to matters of detail, which may—nay, we had almost written must—be advantageously left in the hands of some body more conversant with the question, and more readily set in motion from time to time as experience may require, than the two Houses of Parliament can possibly be.

13. The following enactments shall be made with respect to jurisdiction under this Act:

- (1) Any jurisdiction hitherto exercised by the Court of Chancery, or by the Court of Admiralty, otherwise than under the authority of an Act of Parliament, is declared to be part of the common law of England, and to modify such common law to the extent in which it differs therefrom:
- (2) Any jurisdiction by this Act transferred to the High Court of Justice shall, subject to any rules of court made under this Act, be exercised by the High Court of Justice, or any divisional or other court thereof:

- (3) Any cause of suit or action or of other civil legal proceeding which has hitherto been available in any court of equity, shall, subject to any rules of court made in pursuance of this Act, be available in the High Court of Justice and in every divisional or other court thereof.
- (4) Any answer, plea, or defence in any suit, action, or other civil legal proceeding which has hitherto been available in any court of equity, shall, subject to any rules of court made in pursuance of this Act, be available in the High Court of Justice and in every divisional or other court thereof.

If this section be fairly acted upon, the distinction, concerning which so much has been said and written, between law and equity, will disappear so far as it is practicable to get rid of it: to a certain extent it is, as we have often pointed out, inherent in the nature of human transactions, and to that extent no fusion is possible; and nothing but what Lord Romilly rather aptly described as “a foolish confusion” can result from any attempt to establish it; but so far as the distinction is artificial it will cease to exist so soon as a race of judges shall have arisen capable of carrying out this section according to its spirit, and willing to do so loyally. Unfortunately any one who knows what has been the legal training of the present occupants of the judicial bench will find that it involves no disrespect to them to admit that they are not the former; and even if they were, they are, unless we are grievously misinformed, anything but ready to show themselves the latter. It is, perhaps, a sign of wisdom on the part of the framers of the bill that they provide for the temporary preservation of the existing arrangements, even after the commencement of the Act, not because there is really any difficulty in getting rid of the most glaring of the present evils, but because that vis inertia which is perhaps the most formidable opponent of the proposed changes is thereby sensibly reduced.

The second principal alteration in the amended bill is the substitute of “a committee of council,” constituted as we have mentioned, for the judges of the High Court, as the body authorised to make rules under the Act. This is a daring, and not, we think, a happy innovation upon all prior practice, but the blame of it, if it blame it deserve, must rest upon Lord Westbury, inasmuch as it has been expressly introduced to obviate, if possible, his objection, taken on the occasion of the second reading, that so large a body as the High Court never could be got to frame any rules whatever. We did not, and do not, agree with this criticism; and we cannot think that a sort of mixture of the Cabinet and the Judicial Committee, such as the proposed committee of council seems to be, will be as fit a body to frame such rules as the judges who have to work them would be. There is, moreover, this serious defect, that the judges are the persons who, if there be a casus omisus, or a misconceived regulation, are the first persons to discover its existence and the fittest to see the proper remedy; and they ought therefore to be entrusted with the power—and the duty—of supplying such remedy as may be required, and not left to make a somewhat undignified representation to a quasi foreign body, who, upon a sort of auditū querelæ, are to supply such remedy as they, who have not to work it, think the most desirable.

The general question, whether such rules as those under discussion ought to be made by the Legislature directly or entrusted to some other body, has been the subject of much discussion both in and out of Parliament, but it seems to us clear on principle, and in conformity with almost universal practice, that rules of practice and procedure ought to be framed by the Court, unless it has shown itself so averse to reform as to refuse, or so incompetent as to be unable to do so; and even in these cases the proper remedy is rather to reform the Court than to impose legislative rules. On questions of jurisdiction it is otherwise, and we think that all questions involving a change in the functions of the Court, or the authority of its judges or officers, should be defined by law, and not left to the Court to work out as it pleases. The original bill before us hardly fulfilled this condition, but the defect in this respect has been greatly, if not completely, removed by the alteration in question.

The remaining alteration relates to the Home Circuit. The bill as brought in proposed to abolish it altogether, and in our former article we pointed out some of the most obvious objections to the proposal as made. These have been removed, no doubt, but in removing them the proposed abolition has practically disappeared. The present proposal, which is contained in the 26th and 27th sections of the amended bill, goes no further than to authorise the trial in London or Westminster of local actions properly triable in any county on the Home Circuit, with an express saving of the right to send Commissions of Assize or Nisi Prius into those counties; and similarly to authorise the trial in the Central Criminal Court of all offenders triable in any such county, but without prejudice to the issue of Commissions of Oyer and Terminer and gaol delivery into those counties.

The following is the provision introduced to meet our objection as to jurors* :—

All persons liable to serve on grand, special, or common juries at the assizes held for any of the said counties of Hertford, Essex, Kent, Sussex, or Surrey shall be liable to serve at any sittings to be held for the trial of cases to be tried in London or Middlesex in pursuance of this section, and such jurymen shall be summoned by the sheriffs of the said counties respectively in pursuance of any precept or precepts to be issued by any judge or judges authorised to hold the said sittings.

Unless the actions brought under this Act are specially earmarked, and placed in lists by themselves, it seems to us that this enactment will introduce a considerable confusion into the practical working of the Nisi Prius Sittings in London and Middlesex, but possibly this evil may be avoided by apt "rules of court." Considering, however, that the local actions tried under this section in London or Middlesex instead of on the Home Circuit will certainly be few in number, and most of them in all probability will be undefended ejectments, it scarcely seems worth while to have an elaborate machinery for summary powers to try them.

BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETIES.

NO. I.

It is now nearly thirty-five years since the passing of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, the principal Act governing Benefit Building Societies at the present time. These societies are now very numerous, and the transactions of some of them are carried on upon a very extended scale. Although they have existed in England for more than forty years, yet the exact operation of these societies was not clearly understood until a few years ago, and then the question was mooted whether they were benefit societies, or rather whether the benefits that accrued from them did not accrue to the officers and the depositors rather than to the members. Whether this be so or not it will be far easier to comprehend when we have set out, as we propose to do concisely, the nature and privileges of building societies and the results of some of the more important of the cases decided in reference thereto. We cannot do more in the space at our disposal than mark the main heads of our subject.

Benefit Building Societies are joint stock associations—not governed, however, by the Companies Act, 1862, except for the purposes of winding-up—having for their object to enable each member thereof to build a house upon a piece of ground already his own; or, what is practically the same thing, to purchase a piece of ground with a house already built upon it. They are based upon the fact that tenants often pay to landlords as rent a greater amount of money than the ordinary interest upon the purchase-money of the house, and that the difference between the interest and the rent if accumulated at compound interest will in time pay off the purchase-money. Thus, if a man pays £30 a-year rent for a house worth £300, were he to borrow £300 and buy the house he would only pay say £15 a-year interest on the loan, and thus he would save £15 a-year. Now, £15 a-year accumulated at compound interest does not take a lifetime to roll up into £300, especially if that compound interest is monthly, and thus the money is turned over twelve times in the year. Such being the theory let us now see how it has been put in practice by these societies.

At the outset we come upon this fact, that building societies are of two kinds, terminating and permanent. The former is the older, and was once the only kind, but it is now almost entirely superseded by the latter. Our chief attention will be devoted to the latter, but we must first indicate the difference between the two. The operation of a terminating society cannot be better described than in the language of Lord Cranworth in Fleming v. Self (3 W. R. 89, 3 De G. M. & G. 1018):—

"The principle is this, members subscribe monthly sums, which are accumulated till the fund is sufficient to give a stipulated sum to each member, and then the whole is divided amongst them. In the society now in question the sum to be raised for each member is £100. If this were all, it would be a very simple transaction—mere accumulation, and the only question would be how to invest the sums subscribed to the greatest advantage. But this is not all; one main object is to enable members to obtain their £100 by anticipation, on their allowing a large discount. For this purpose, when a sufficient sum is in the hands of the treasurer, the members who desire to get their shares in advance bid, by a sort of auction, the sum which they are ready to allow as discount, and the highest bidder obtains the advance. Thus, if at the end of a year the sum of £500 is in the hands of the treasurer, arising from the monthly subscriptions, and the holder of ten shares is willing to allow a discount of fifty per cent. (no one offering more), the £500 is or may be advanced to him, being £250 in satisfaction of each of his ten shares. For this accommodation he is bound to pay monthly, till a sum is raised sufficient to give £100 per share to all the other members, not only the original monthly subscription, but also a further monthly sum called redemption money. . . . If, after such an advance as I have supposed, no further advance were made, the natural course of the society would be that the members, other than the holder of the ten shares, would continue their monthly subscriptions, and the holder of the ten shares would continue his monthly subscriptions and redemption money, till the fund thus raised should be sufficient to pay £100 per share to every member other than the holder of the ten satisfied shares. . . . After the advance, the condition of every shareholder other than the holder of the ten advanced shares, is, that he is to contribute his monthly payments till they, together with the monthly payments and redemption money contributed by the owner of the advanced shares, are sufficient to realise, not £10,000, but £9,000, that is £100 for each share other than the ten shares of the advanced member whose shares will have been already satisfied by the £500. He loses his interest in the £500 advanced to the owner of the ten shares, but on the other hand the sum to be raised is only £9,000 instead of £10,000, and the monthly contribution is increased by the amount of the redemption money paid by the member who has received his ten shares in advance. Further advances are made from time to time as funds are accumulated, and as the members are inclined to give high discount in order to obtain payment of their shares by anticipation. The gain to the society arises mainly from the high rate of discount which members in want of money are ready to give; in truth, the whole scheme is but an elaborate contrivance for enabling persons having sums for which they have no immediate want to lend them to others at a very high rate of interest. In order to secure the due payment of the monthly subscription and redemption money by the members who have received their shares in advance, they

As soon as every member of the society has received his share, or an advance in lieu of his share, the society terminates or comes to an end. A simple calculation will show that the unadvanced members will, on the termination of the society receive £100, although their payments to the society will not much exceed £60, and thus they will receive a high rate of interest for their money.

A permanent differs from a terminating society in that members can enter at any time in the one, but must all join at once in the other; so a member can withdraw at any time from a permanent, but cannot from a terminating society until all his subscriptions are fully paid. As an illustration of a permanent society, we may take the Birkbeck. In this society the shares are fixed at £50. There is an entrance fee of 2s. 6d. and a monthly subscription of 6s. 6s. for the period of ten years. At the expiration of ten years the members will have paid £38 7s. 6d., and will be entitled to withdraw. On withdrawal the member will receive £50 and a bonus. If he continues a member he will receive interest at 45 per cent. on his £50. If a member withdraws before his subscriptions are fully paid up—which he can do after he has been a member for one year—he will be entitled to receive back what he has paid, with interest. But the object of the society is not nominally for investment, but to enable the members "to purchase or erect a dwelling-house or houses, or other real or leasehold estate in any part of Great Britain." This, it is assumed, members will want to do before the expiration of the ten years, and, therefore, there are provisions for enabling them to obtain advances from the society according to the amount of their shares. The terms upon which such advances are made we propose to discuss, but before doing so a brief synopsis of the effect of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, must be given. The Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, after enacting that building societies may be formed of any number of persons to raise by monthly or other subscriptions, which are not to exceed 20s. per month per share, shares not exceeding in value £150 each, and to enable the members to receive out of the funds of the society the value of their shares to erect or purchase dwelling-houses or other real or leasehold estate, the same to be mortgaged to the society until such value as aforesaid has been repaid, proceeds to enact, among other things, that the major part of the society may make rules not repugnant to the Act or the general laws of the land, and may inflict reasonable fines, penalties, and forfeitures upon members offending against such rules (section 1); that the society may take any bonus from any member on any share or shares for the privilege of receiving the same on advance (section 2); that forms of conveyance, mortgage, &c., are to be scheduled to the rules (section 3); that the provisions of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 40, applicable to a building society and the rules thereof are to be incorporated in the Act (section 4); and that a receipt endorsed on a mortgage deed by the trustees of a society shall vacate the mortgage, and vest the estate in the persons for the time being entitled to the equity of redemption (section 5).

The rules of building societies are governed by 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and by the 3rd, 5th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th and 27th sections of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, and the 4th and 7th sections of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 40, which sections of the two last mentioned Acts are incorporated by reference into the first mentioned Act. When the rules are properly certified they acquire the power of legislative enactments (per Lord Romilly, M.R., in Handley v. Farmer, 29 Beav. 369); but although the rules are binding on the members of a society, they do not affect persons who are not members in their dealings with the society (Bottomley v. Fisher, 10 W. R. 669). The rules are to be made by a majority of the members, and must not be repugnant to the provisions of the Acts mentioned above, nor to the general laws of the realm; they must declare the intent and purposes for which the society is established, and the uses and purposes to which the society's funds are to be applied, and under what circumstances any member or other person is to become entitled thereto; they must specify the place of meeting and the powers and duties of the members at large, and of such committees or officers as may be appointed; they must also contain a provision how disputes between the society and its members are to be settled, whether by justices of the peace or by arbitrators, and if in the latter way, the method of appointing the arbitrators is laid down by the 27th section of the Act of Geo. 4. When a set of rules have been approved by a majority of the members of any society containing these requisite provisions, and any further ones necessary for the management of the society, they have hitherto been required to be certified by the barrister appointed for that purpose in England or Ireland, or by the Lord Advocate or his deputy in Scotland, and at his instance to be confirmed by the quarter sessions. The procedure for altering the rules is analogous. Until the rules have been certified they cannot be acted upon, and do not bind the members, but when they have been certified they bind the members from the date of the certificate. The certificate of the barrister only proves that the requirements of the Acts of Parliament have been complied with, and does not conclude the question of the validity or invalidity of the rules. In other words, the certificate of the barrister cannot make an illegal rule legal. This was one of the points decided in Laing v. Reed (18 W. R. 76), where Lord Hatherley said, "Two points are raised—first, that the 18th rule is not ultra vires; second, that if there be a doubt on that subject, the certificate of the barrister is competent to determine the legal question. As to this latter point it could not be contended that if a rule were clearly ultra vires the certificate would have any effect. The judgment of the barrister is probably restricted to details and confined to very narrow limits, and on this point it is not necessary to say more than that the certificate has no bearing on the case. The sole question then is whether this rule is ultra vires." This decision seems to be at variance with that of the majority of the Court of Queen's Bench in Dewhurst v. Clarkson (2 W. R. 199). In that case Lord Campbell, C.J., and Justices Coleridge and Wightman held that the rules when duly certified are binding upon the officers and members of a society, and their validity cannot afterwards be questioned. Mr. Justice Erle, however, differed from the rest of the Court and gave a separate judgment. He held that the certificate only fixes the time from which the rules are in force, and does not conclude a member from disputing them. This is in conformity with the decision of Lord Hatherley in Laing v. Reed. In the event of the bill for the amendment of the laws relating to friendly societies now before Parliament becoming law, the rules of building societies will no longer require certifying, the office of registrar of friendly societies will be abolished, and the registration of these societies will henceforth be conducted by the Board of Trade. When a building society is established under the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, it has the following among other advantages:—The rules may be legally enforced against the members, the trustees or treasurer may sue and be sued with respect to the property of the society in their own names, debts due by any officer are payable in priority to all other debts on his death or bankruptcy, any sum not exceeding £20 which may be due to a member from the society may be paid upon his death without administration being taken out to him. All securities given to a member are exempt from stamp duty, and no reconveyance of property mortgaged to the society is necessary on repayment of the mortgage debt, for the 5th section of the Building Societies Act enacts that a receipt endorsed on a mortgage, or further charge for all moneys intended to be thereby secured shall "vacate the same and vest the estate of and in the property comprised in such security in the person or persons for the time being entitled to the equity of redemption." This section was commented upon by Lord Cairns in Pease v. Jackson (L. R. 3 Ch. App. 576, 17 W. R. 2). He observed that though obscure, it must mean one of two things—either "that if the mortgagor comes to the building society and pays off the mortgage money and a receipt is endorsed stating that he, in one sense, certainly then owner of the equity of redemption has paid off the mortgage money thereupon without it being necessary for the trustee to give him, on that payment, a re-conveyance of the property mortgaged, the property shall vest in him who pays off the mortgage money, and who is the owner of the equity of redemption;" or "that no matter who pays off the mortgage money the receipt endorsed is to divest the charge of the building society, and the legal estate in the mortgaged premises is to go at large to whosoever of all the persons entitled in any shape or form to the equity of redemption as the best equity to call for the legal estate." In any case the Act, he said, did not mean, as the Master of the Rolls had held, that the receipt should vest the mortgaged property in her next equitable incumbrancers in point of time.

REVIEWS.

The Law of Building and Freehold Land Societies in England and Scotland, embracing Procedure on Formation, Rights and Liabilities of Members, Legal Status, and Compulsory and Voluntary Dissolution. With an Appendix of Statutes, Forms of Rules, and Precedents of English and Scotch Securities.—By HENRY F. A. DAVIS. London: H. Sweet.

It is rather a curious coincidence that since our articles on building societies (one of which appears in another column) were written we have received the above work on the same subject. Mr. Davis informs the reader in his preface that he has "endeavoured throughout to confine himself almost exclusively to the consideration of the law, and has only referred to the business when it was necessary to do so, in order to gain a clearer apprehension of the reason for, and the operation of, this law." The work, however, contains a great deal of practical information respecting the formation, registration, &c., of building societies, and in an appendix are given a form of rules for a permanent society, forms of securities, forms of proceedings before justices, and a print of the Acts of Parliament. The writer has gone into the subject with intelligent research. He censures, and certainly with justice, the confused state of the statutes by which the registration, &c., of these societies purports to be regulated, and does what is still more useful to the legal reader—viz., lays his finger upon the doubts. We think this book will be very useful to lawyers concerned in any manner for benefit building societies, their members, or parties affected by their operations. The decisions material to the subject have been industriously noted and cited, including such late cases as the appeal decision in Laing v. Reed (18 W. R. 76) and Williamson's case (18 W. R. 388). We cannot acquiesce in the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Davis in the course of his remarks on the case of Pease v. Jackson (17 W. R. 3). On this point it is worth bearing in mind that the case of Prosser v. Rice (28 Beav. 68) is virtually overruled by Lord Cairns' decision. We do not think that the index of this work, though certainly full, is all that it might have been. The book, however, will, as we have said, be found really serviceable.

COURTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

LORD JUSTICE GIFFARD.

May 3.—Guest v. Smythe.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls (reported ante, 437, and 18 W. R. 617) setting aside a purchase by Mr. Wight, a solicitor, in a sale made in this foreclosure suit. Mr. Wight was not concerned in Guest v. Smythe, but was concerned for a Miss Gibbons in another suit which had been instituted by creditors of the mortgagee (who was dead) for administration of the estate of the latter.

After the sale, upon a summons issued the day before, he obtained leave, on behalf of his clients, to attend the proceedings in Guest v. Smythe. Mr. Wight attended the sale in person, and announced his intention of bidding on his own account; he deposed that he had acquired no knowledge of the property by having been employed in the affairs of his clients, and did not know the reserved price which had been fixed in chambers. His name had, without his knowledge, been placed on the particulars as a reference for information. Under these circumstances, a summons was taken out in the Rolls Chambers to set aside the sale, on the ground that Mr. Wight was disqualified from purchasing the property. The Master of the Rolls set aside the sale, and ordered the property to be resold. From this decision Mr. Wight appealed.

Jessel, Q.C., and Bagshawe were for the appellant; Southgate, Q.C., and Simmonds in support of the order of the Master of the Rolls; Swanston, Q.C., and Bovill were for the plaintiff in Guest v. Smythe.

The following cases were referred to:—White v. Wilson, (14 Ves. 151), Morice v. The Bishop of Durham (11 Ves. 57), Fergus v. Gore (1 Sch. & Lef. 107—350), Gower's case cited in Watson v. Birch (2 Ves. Jun. 51), Thornhill v. Thornhill (2 J. & W. 347), Lister v. Lister (6 Ves. 631), Ex parte Myles (6 Ves. 617), Campbell v. Walker (5 Ves. 678).

GIFFARD, L.J., said that it was important, on the one hand, that the rule of the Court which prevented persons interested in the property, or persons in a fiduciary position, from bidding at a sale should not be relaxed, but, on the other hand, it was important that sales under the direction of the Court should not be impeached more easily than any other sales. The general rule was that neither the vendor nor any of the parties to the suit, nor, of course, their solicitors, could bid without the leave of the Court; and the rule extended to some other persons filling a fiduciary position. If the present case fell within any of those rules he should not hesitate to affirm the decision appealed from. But to do so would be to carry the rule so far as often to preclude from bidding the very persons whose bidding would be most desirable. Mr. Wight was not the solicitor of any of the parties to the suit; the particulars of sale were not prepared by him; he was not consulted about them at all; they were prepared long before his name appeared upon them; he was not consulted about the reserved bidding, and he did not know what it was. His only connection with the suit was that the day before the sale his client, Miss Gibbons, took out a summons for leave to attend the proceedings. When the sale was held it was clear that his client might have bid, and if so, why might not he himself? At the sale the reserved bidding was passed, and there was not a tittle of evidence to show that the sale was improperly conducted, or that any person was prevented from bidding. The sale was afterwards confirmed, and Mr. Wight did not attend the proceedings before this, nor did his client. Could it be said that a person who had nothing to do with the conduct of the sale in any way was precluded from bidding at it, and if the client were not, why should her solicitor be precluded, the application to set aside the sale being made by persons who had all the means of seeing that the sale was properly conducted? That being so, the only question was as to the reference made to Mr. Wight upon the particulars of sale. Was it to be laid down that when it was stated that copies of the particulars could be obtained of certain solicitors whose names were mentioned, they not having been consulted as to the preparation of the particulars at all, and then one of those solicitors happened to bid at the sale, either for himself or for any one else, the sale must be set aside? That would be to strain the rule of the Court very far. It was not essential to the ends of justice, and would tend to depreciate sales by the Court very much. If there was not already some settled rule known to all the world that a person whose name was mentioned in that way in particulars of sale must be taken to have some interest in the sale, his Lordship thought there was no necessity for laying down such a rule. The order of the Master of the Rolls must be discharged, and Mr. Wight must have his costs at the Rolls out of the purchase-money, except the costs of some affidavits, which his Lordship specified. There would be no costs of the appeal.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

May 2.—Re Braund (a Solicitor).

This was a summons for taxation of Mr. Braund's bill of costs, delivered to the trustees of the settled estates of the late Earl of Harrington; and an objection was taken by the solicitors attending the taxation on behalf of the tenant for life of the settled estates to the propriety of certain conferences, about thirteen in number, charged for in the bill, together with the corresponding number of attendances on counsel. It was originally alleged that the conferences in question were either not had, or if had, were had needlessly; and the Master of the Rolls when the matter was before him in March last expressed an opinion that the question was one which affected the honour of the profession, and requested Mr. Morshead, the counsel with whom the conferences were had, to make a statement in writing for the information of the court, and adjourned the matter for that purpose.

The matter was in the paper to day, when Jessel, Q.C. (C. Hall with him), for the solicitors of the tenant for life, said, that having seen the statement of Mr. Morshead he was satisfied that the transaction was bona fide and the conferences were properly had; and submitted to pay the charges therefor, except as to three conferences of which no mention was made in Mr. Morshead's statement, and the costs of the application.

Southgate, Q.C. (Cracknall with him), for Mr. Braund, said that these conferences had, like the rest, been had and paid for by his client, but he was willing nevertheless to accede to the offer. The matter was thus settled, and

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS expressed his pleasure at the affair having ended satisfactorily and to the credit of all the parties concerned.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

April 29.—Re Sager.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125, 126, rules 189, 291—Solicitor's costs incidental to passing resolution and registration thereof.

Mr. Ellerton, solicitor, applied under a petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition filed by the debtor pursuant to the provisions of the 125th and 126th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, for an order upon the trustees that out of the monies received from the sale of the assets of the debtor they should pay the costs of and incidental to the passing of the resolution and of and incidental to the registration thereof. It appeared that at a meeting duly held for that purpose a resolution was passed for a liquidation by arrangement, and that the solicitor making the present application was entrusted with the registration, which was accordingly effected in due course. The trustees had realised the property of the debtor, but declined to pay the costs of the solicitor without an order of the Court.

The CHIEF JUDGE at the outset intimated that the two things stood upon quite a different footing. The solicitor had a right to require from the trustees payment of the costs prior to the passing of the resolution, and, when the liquidation was complete, he had the ordinary right to recover his further costs.

Mr. Ellerton referred to the 189th and 291st of the new rules, and contended that, as the resolution had been duly registered, he was entitled to an order of the Court for payment of the costs of registration.

The CHIEF JUDGE asked whether notice had been given to the trustees of the present application.

Mr. Ellerton.—Yes; and the costs could not be taxed until the Court made an order for their payment under rule 189.

The CHIEF JUDGE, after some consideration, said that Mr. Ellerton might take an order for payment of his taxed costs.

Application granted.

May 2.—Re Cheeseman.

Bankruptcy Act, 1829, ss. 125 & 126—Stay of adjudication—When refused.

On the 9th April a petition for adjudication was served on the debtor at the instance of George Ball, and on the 28th the debtor was adjudicated a bankrupt. On the 27th the debtor filed a petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition under the 125th and 126th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869; and he now moved for a stay of the adjudication, or if it proceeded, that the registrar as trustee should continue a suit in Chancery which he had instituted against a former partner, and from which it was alleged a sum of £8,500 was likely to be realised, the chief clerk having certified that sum as appearing to be due to the debtor. It was alleged, however, that the suit had been pending since the year 1865, and although various exceptions had been taken to the chief clerk's certificate, the debtor confidently hoped that a sufficient sum would be obtained in the suit to pay the whole of the creditors in full.

Nicholson, in support of the motion.

Reed, for the petitioning creditor in opposition.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—There is no ground whatever for this motion, and no single fact has been suggested to cause me to believe that it will be for the benefit of the creditors, or even for the benefit of the bankrupt, that the matter should not proceed regularly. All he says is that he is a party to a suit in the Court of Chancery, and that he will derive benefit from it. The bankruptcy must go on, and the present motion must be dismissed, with costs against the person moving.

Solicitor for the debtor, W. S. Webster.

Solicitor for the petitioning creditor, W. J. Scott.

APPOINTMENTS.

SIR FRANCIS SMITH, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Tasmania, has been appointed Chief Justice of that colony, in succession to Sir Valentine Fleming, who has retired after sixteen years' service on the bench at Hobart Town. Sir Francis is the eldest son of the late Francis Smith, Esq., a London merchant, formerly of Lindfield, Sussex. He was born in 1819, and graduated B.A. at the University of London in 1840, having previously studied at University College. In May, 1842, he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple, and soon afterwards proceeded to Hobart Town. In 1849 he was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania, and in the same year was appointed Solicitor-General for the colony. He became Attorney-General in 1854, when he was also nominated a member of the Executive Council. Becoming Premier in 1857, he continued at the head of the Tasmanian ministry till 1860, when he was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court. Sir Francis Smith was knighted by patent in 1862.

MR. CHARLES ARTHUR TURNER, a puisne judge of the High Court of the North West Provinces, has been appointed to officiate as Chief Justice at Allahabad, in the absence of Sir Walter Morgan, on sick leave in England. Mr. Turner was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1856; he was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in April, 1858, and for some years practised on the Western Circuit. In 1866, on the formation of the High Court of the North-West Provinces, he was nominated a puisne judge, being the only barrister so appointed besides the Chief Justice.

MR. GEORGE ROBERT MOSSMAN, solicitor, of Bradford, Yorkshire, has been elected Clerk to the Justices of the East Morley division of the West Riding of Yorkshire, in the room of his father, the late Mr. G. R. Mossman, who had held the office for upwards of forty years. Mr. Mossman was certificated as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term, 1852, and is also Clerk to the Borough Justices of Bradford. For more than a year past he has virtually occupied the office of Clerk to the West Riding Justices, to which he has now been appointed, having acted in that capacity during his deceased father's illness.

MR. WILLIAM WILDING, solicitor, of Montgomery, has been appointed Clerk to the Guardians of Forden Union. Mr. Wilding was certificated in Hilary Term, 1847, and was Clerk to the late Incorporation for the Relief of the Poor for nearly seventeen years. He is a member of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association.

MR. ROBERT CHAPMAN, solicitor, of Leyburn, Yorkshire, has been elected Clerk to the Leyburn Board of Guardians, in place of Mr. H. T. Robinson, his senior partner, who has resigned after serving in that capacity for the period of thirty-three years. Mr. Chapman was certificated in Easter Term, 1864, and is also deputy clerk of the county court under Mr. Robinson.

Mr. HENRY SHERSTON BAKER, barrister-at-law, has been appointed her Majesty's Lieutenant of Portland Castle, Weymouth, in succession to his uncle, the late Captain Manning. Portland is a royal manor. Mr. Baker was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in May, 1840.

Mr. LLEWELLYN TURNER, solicitor, of Carnarvon, and mayor of that borough, has been appointed Deputy Constable of Carnarvon Castle, vice Mr. J. Morgan. Mr. Turner was certificated in Easter Term, 1847.

Mr. WOOLNOUGH GROSS, of Botesdale, Suffolk, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the counties of Suffolk and Norfolk.

Mr. CHARLES J. WILKINSON, of the Calcutta bar, has been appointed by the Chief Justice of the High Court to be Official Trustee of Bengal, and also Receiver of the High Court of Calcutta, vice Mr. C. S. Hogg, deceased. Mr. Wilkinson was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in November, 1859, and has practised for some years at Calcutta; he had acted for Mr. Hogg both as Administrator-General and Official Trustee, during his absence on leave, but the former appointment has been conferred on Mr. Broughton.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

E. C. has not sent his name and address.

REPLY TO A COMPLAINT.

Sir,—With your permission I should like to make one or two remarks in answer to a letter which you published last week from "A Solicitor."

In the first place your correspondent is aggrieved by what he calls "the iniquitous system," under which he, as an attorney, is debarred from "pleading in the superior courts." Let me remind him that he has one very simple remedy in his own hands—to leave the branch of the profession which he has chosen and take the necessary steps to be admitted into that branch of the profession which has exclusive right of audience in Westminster Hall. He would in that case have frequent opportunities of checking "the petulance and impatience of the bench" (under which he must now sit silent), by the exercise of that remarkable faculty for smart repartee which has been developed, it would seem, in the less dignified arena of a county court.

But, in the second place, "A Solicitor" seems to be under the impression that if Baron Channell had been a county court judge "he would have been responsible in damages" (not a very legal phrase) for uttering what your correspondent considers "a most unwarrantable and damaging slander." If he will refer to the leading case of Scott v. Stansfeld, 16 W. R. 911, L. R. 3 Ex. 20 (June, 1868), he will find that no county court judge, any more than any other judge of any court of record, is answerable for any comments on the conduct of the attorneys in the court, no matter how false, malicious, or irrelevant his comments may be.

Lastly, it does seem strange, if the plaintiff's attorney was accused by the Court of "gross negligence" in omitting to do what he had been distinctly advised by two counsel it was not necessary for him to do, that neither counsel should have thought proper to exonerate the attorney there and then by stating the simple fact that he was acting under their advice.

A BARRISTER.

Monday the 23rd inst., has been appointed by Mr. Baron Bramwell for hearing the Bristol Election Petition. Mr. Sergeant Ballantine has been retained for the petitioners.

Mr. Charles Richard Copeman, solicitor, of Liverpool, has been elected solicitor to the Liverpool Conservative Association, in the room of Mr. Weir Anderson, who has received an appointment in Canada. Mr. Copeman, who took out his certificate as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term, 1858, is a member of the Liverpool Law Society, and of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association.

Mr. William Alexander Mackinnon, formerly M.P. for Rye, who died at Broadstairs on the 30th of April, at the advanced age of eighty, was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards entered Lincoln's Inn as a law student, but was never called to the bar. As a legislator, he was instrumental in abolishing burials in towns, in abating the smoke nuisance, causing the removal of Smithfield Market, and establishing the rural police of 1855, &c.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

April 29.—The High Court of Justice Bill.—The Lord Chancellor moved to go into committee on this bill, which had already been committed pro forma. Lord Westbury had then expressed great regret that no provision had been made for immediate arrangements which would enable the Court when constituted to assume all the functions and jurisdictions now possessed by a great variety of Courts, the object of the bill being to combine in one course of procedure, and under the jurisdiction of one Court, all those functions and jurisdictions, and to secure as much as possible uniformity of practice, the divisions of that Court being made simply for the convenience of business, and not for separate jurisdictions. The bill originally proposed that the duty of framing a code of procedure should be entrusted to the whole body of the Court, which would consist of twenty-three judges, and Lord Westbury feared that, considering their ordinary duties and the possible discrepancies of opinion which would exist, the object to be attained would be indefinitely postponed. He (the Lord Chancellor) did not see much force in this objection on the score of delay, but at the same time felt there was some ground for the apprehension of considerable discrepancies of opinion amongst judges habituated to the old system. Moreover, they could not meet to deliberate until the Act itself came into effect in Michaelmas Term, 1871, though power was given to the Crown by an Order in Council to accelerate the operation of the Act. He had considered therefore that instead of entrusting this duty to the whole body of judges, and instead, as Lord Westbury had suggested, of referring it back to the Commission, the rules should be framed by a committee of the Privy Council, care being taken that there should always be upon it the Lord Chancellor and the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being; the former to supervise and consider the modifications which might be necessary in procedure; the latter to watch over the additional expense, if any, which the regulations might involve. The committee might call to their assistance any other members of the Privy Council, thus affording a body fully competent for the duty, while many of them would have much more leisure than the judges. Moreover, they were to begin immediately on the passing of the Act, so that before its full operation the rules could be fully considered and settled. The success of last year in producing the Bankruptcy Rules led him to anticipate no difficulty on this point, and the entrusting to a Committee of Council the important duty of framing a code of procedure would set a valuable precedent with regard to amendments in our judicial proceedings, and in the law itself. Lord Penzance had advised that the bill should definitely indicate the general course of procedure which the Legislature desired, so that there might be no intermixture or clashing between the Common Law, Equity, or Admiralty Courts, but one common course of procedure. One of the clauses now stated that the course of procedure in the Admiralty or Equity Courts, where they had exercised jurisdiction, should be part and parcel of the common law course of procedure, and that where any rule of common law conflicts with them the Equity and Admiralty rules shall prevail. The bill, as originally drawn, proposed the abolition of the Home Circuit, which was objected to by Lord Chelmsford and the Duke of Richmond. It was now proposed simply to give jurisdiction to the Courts at Westminster over all matters now triable on the Home Circuit, so that suitors would have their choice whether the proceedings are conducted at Westminster or not, and to give an equal jurisdiction in criminal matters to the Central Criminal Court, such as it already possessed over a large portion of the Home counties. This, however, was not to interfere with the issuing of such commissions of assize as might be thought proper in those counties. The matter would thus be practically tested, and he believed that as to the civil business, at least, there would be a very general desire to transfer it to the metropolis. A commission of gaol delivery must, no doubt, be held for disposing of criminal cases, especially in Sussex. These were the changes made in the bill in matters of principle. With regard to the second bill, very general dissatisfaction was expressed on the second reading with the part of it dealing with the appellate jurisdiction of this House. He had, therefore, though not altogether sharing in those objections, thought it right to omit that portion of it, seeing that it had not the authority of the Commission, who were not authorised to deal with that question. With regard to the objection that by the operation of the two bills three or four appeals would be allowed where at present there were only two, the intention was that there should be an expeditious appeal from the decision of one judge to three or more judges on interlocutory matters, injunctions being often of importance to the parties, although not affecting the final settlement of the cause. The object was that this appeal should be confined to interlocutory matters, while appeals deciding the merits of the cause would be carried only to the High Court of Appeal, just as they were now carried to the High Court of Appeal in Chancery and the Court of Exchequer Chamber. No further interlocutory appeal would be allowed, so that appeals would not be multiplied, but would in several respects be diminished.—Lord Romilly thought a little more time should have been allowed before going into committee. His own objections to the original bill had been almost all met, but he had many suggestions to make on the amended bill, for which there would be scarcely time. The framing of rules of procedure to fuse law and equity would require much time and care. He would give a simple illustration arising from the peculiar difference between the legal estate and the equitable estate. The owner of an estate for life without impeachment of waste might act exactly as if he were the owner in fee-simple, and might cut down timber, open mines, &c. Not unfrequently such a man cut down all the ornamental timber, destroyed the hothouses, and tore away the lead from the house. An action was brought against him in one of the Common Law Courts, but the Court held, as has been done from the time of Lord Coke, that he could do what he pleased, and could not be made liable for waste. The suitor was told that he had made a mistake and must go to the Court of Chancery, where he immediately obtained an injunction, on the principle that the man was making an inequitable use of a legal right. Now, in laying down one course of procedure would they alter the law with respect to impeachment of waste, or would they say that whether an action was brought or a bill is filed it should be dealt with in the same manner? It would surely be necessary to define exactly what an estate for life without impeachment of waste consists in, for at present by common law a man might do any kind of destruction, while equity held that he could not make use of a legal right to do an injustice to his children or successors. They would never get a perfect union of law and equity unless they made a code of laws altering the character of the laws now existing. They were now making a prodigious alteration in English law, with which many persons would be shocked, and the fusion of law and equity would require great care and time.—Lord Cairns, speaking as a member of the Judicature Commission, said the proposed change was indeed prodigious. Year after year during the greater part of the present century we had made various attempts at improving our system of law and judicature, but almost all of them were small, imperfect and fragmentary; and, although great improvements had been made, even in that manner, the reason why our law was open to the reproaches cast upon it was that none of those measures were conceived in a large and generous spirit, or went to the root of the real evils in our system of judicature. If we only added another to the many fragmentary measures passed, we should but bring disgrace on the Legislature, while, if we accomplished the aim of the Commission, and once for all settled our system of judicature on a broad, intelligible and practicable basis, we should obtain a degree of credit as great as ever attended on any measure passed by Parliament. The main object of the measures, like that of the Commission, was to put an end to the inconvenient and irrational distinction between law and equity which had crept into our system; but he could not discover in the bills any machinery by which this was accomplished. Beyond the definition of the offices of the judges and their officers and salaries, everything, with perhaps the exception of two or three general sentences introduced into the amended bill, was relegated to a body outside Parliament, originally the judges and now a Committee of the Privy Council. Now, the distinction between law and equity was not so much a matter of principle as of form and procedure. Why was it that a barrister or a solicitor accustomed to the courts of equity, if he passed to the other side of Westminster Hall into one of the common law courts was as ignorant of its forms and procedure as if he were in the court of a foreign country? It was not that law and equity were, with rare exceptions, acting on different principles. The laws of evidence were the same; so, too, were the laws of the construction of written instruments and the modes of dealing with Acts of Parliament; but from the beginning to the end the forms and technical details were essentially different. It was to this subject that, in the first instance, attention had been directed. In the Court of Chancery, the three common law courts, the Courts of Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty, the proceedings all began by a different writ issued from a different office, so that, before any person who had a complaint could make it the subject of a civil proceeding, he must be advised, and pay for that advice, as to what court to apply to for a writ. The Commission thought it the right of every subject to say that there should be one writ applicable to every kind of civil inquiry issuing from one office, so that, without any technical advice as to where the action should be brought he might get a writ without any fear of mistake. Now, there was no provision in the bill on that subject, and he doubted whether by means of rules they could deal with the whole complicated system of writs and offices, and substitute one writ applicable to all civil cases. The Commission next found that each court had a different form of procedure as regards the mode of putting the complaint on the record and the manner of answering it, and they recommended that there should be one uniform system of pleading, describing the form which it should take. Here again the bill was silent, leaving it to some other body, which might or might not do it, and transferring to other shoulders the responsibility of Parliament. He had objected to the plan adopted as to the Bankruptcy Rules, but that case afforded no precedent for a measure proposing to alter the whole system of judicature which had prevailed for centuries, and demanding, if ever a measure did, the attention of the Legislature. When the Common Law Procedure Act was passed, it was not left to the judges or to a committee of council to modify the procedure, but the measure was prepared on the responsibility of the Government, in pursuance of the report of a commission. All its provisions appeared on the face of the bill, and if any rules had to be made subsequently, they were merely as to forms of writ, and mere details. Again, in 1852, when great changes were made in the procedure of the Court of Chancery, in pursuance of a commission, those changes were discussed and settled by Parliament. There were strong reasons against the original proposal that the rules should be passed by the judges; and if, as now proposed, the task was to be entrusted to a Committee of the Privy Council, there was no guarantee that a work of such magnitude would be properly performed. Turning to another point, nobody in framing a general system of judicature would think of establishing separate courts with separate names, implying different jurisdictions and procedures; and had the commission been able to make a tabula rasa they would have recommended one supreme court to transact as a whole, or in divisions, the whole business of the country. There being, however, from twenty to thirty judges of the superior courts, all of them appointed by letters patent judges of specific courts, and entitled to salaries amounting to £100,000 or £150,000 a year, it had been thought that were these courts annihilated they might naturally urge that their offices were gone, and that they had not been consulted as to accepting positions as judges of a court altogether different. Although therefore, the desire was that as the consummation of the measure there should be but one court and one name, it had been thought that, by way of transition, the present names might be preserved as names for the divisions of the one court. Rely upon it, that as long as they preserved the names of Chancery, Queen's Bench, and so forth, the measure would be imperfect, for there would linger about the courts traditions of the old system which would not disappear until the time arrived for giving up the names. He found, however, in the bill no trace of the Legislature setting its mark on those names as destined to come to an end. He agreed that they should be preserved until the present judges passed away, or until their assent was obtained to the change of the title; but there should be a distinct statement that they were to cease, and as soon as possible the court should by an order in council assume its definite title. With regard to the recommendation made by the commissioners for abolishing the Home Circuit and establishing a central Nisi Prius Court, it was clearly prena-ture to carry out the abolition of the Home Circuit and to create this Nisi Prius Court in London, until they were in a position to effect what was necessary as to the whole jury system and the alterations in the other circuits. With regard to the second bill, this separation of the Appellate Court from the Supreme or High Court, was quite at variance with the recommendations of the commission. They had wished to put an end to the multiplying of courts, and to create one Supreme Court, the appellate division being part of it, and having relegated to it the duty of rehearing cases. That would surely be better than a separate court, for when courts were separated there ensued a kind of estrangement between the primary and appellate court, the latter feeling itself more fettered and the former feeling itself more independent than would otherwise be the case. The bill provided also that the appellate court should have no original jurisdiction, and should not hear or rehear any evidence. That, again, ran contrary to the recommendation, and if they constituted the court on that principle they might shut up all the appeals in chancery. Had it not during the last twenty years been necessary in one half the cases of injunctions—owing, perhaps, to the haste with which the original proceedings were conducted—to have some new evidence to supply something that was lacking? All he had said as to the rules of procedure applied equally to the second bill, for it contained no provisions on that subject, and of many of the commissioners' recommendations no notice was taken. If the report of the commission was satisfactory they had a right to expect from the Government a measure giving full effect to it. If, on the other hand, the report of the commission was not satisfactory, then that was a reason for the appointment of another commission, which should make changes not in form but in substance. But he hoped the Lord Chancellor would withdraw these bills, and re-introduce them in this or a subsequent session, with a complete code of procedure upon the face of the bills themselves, so as to carry into effect the main object which was contemplated in the report of the commission.—Lord Westbury said the bills contained one of the most magnificent schemes of law reform produced in his time, but difficult in proportion to its grandeur. The bills could not be accepted in their present imperfect state. They were asked to legislate in perfect ignorance as to what courts, &c., they were establishing. Whether the High Court was to be wholly a court of first instance, disposing of original business merely, or simply a court of rehearing, and in that capacity to control the divisional courts, no man could tell until the rules and orders were drawn up. Was it possible to legislate in that state of ignorance? Instead of making the institution known, and framing it by the help of their legislative wisdom, they were asked merely to give it a name, and then entrust to others the duty of assigning to it the whole of the business it is to transact, and the whole extent of its jurisdiction. They were asked to delegate that which it was their duty to know and decide to another body whose determination upon the matters referred to them could never be effectually revised or controlled by them. It was true that the rules of the court might be laid before Parliament, but it was utterly impossible then to discuss or enter into the consideration of them. They might move an address to the Crown for the rejection of these rules, but they could not exercise any power of control or of personal supervision in respect of them. He took section 16 as an instance of the extraordinary duties thus committed to another body. The selection of the business to be heard before the High Court, the transfer of business from one divisional court to another, the constitution of courts consisting of a less number of judges than was required for a divisional court, and the appropriation of the business to be transacted by such courts—all this was to be done by the Committee of Council. And, after detailing the duties the committee was to perform, the enumeration was wound up by these most sweeping words—that the Committee of Privy Council shall determine “all matters incidental to or connected with the administration of justice.” If a matter of this importance was to be handed over to a small committee of the Privy Council, and not to be submitted to Parliament, why should not any other question be committed to the same tribunal, to be moulded according to their pleasure? He hoped the Lord Chancellor would take time to prepare and submit to the House not a mere outline, but a complete picture, filled up with all the details of pleading, procedure, and general administration which he intended to substitute for those now existing. The present practice had come down to us from the very earliest times; the courts had gone on administering justice in a manner with which the people were familiar; and now they were asked to alter this system in some unknown way, which would not be submitted to the judgment of Parliament. The object was to pull down the wall of partition between the Courts of Law and Equity, but all proposed by this bill was to declare that the jurisdiction exercised by the Court of Chancery should be modified by the common law to the extent to which it differed from it. Now, there were numbers of relations known to the equity which were ignored by the common law court. The relations, for instance, of trustee and cestui que trusts and between husband and wife as separate persons. Much more effectual legislation than this would be required to accomplish the object they had in view, that a suitor should not be driven from one court to another.—Lord Penzance said that to carry out a change of this character, dealing with all the superior courts of the kingdom and their various modes of procedure down to the most minute details, could not be otherwise than a most gigantic task. The whole of Lord Westbury's objections resolved themselves into this, that the bill ought before being laid before Parliament to contain not merely the skeleton or main features of the scheme proposed, but ought to convey on the face of it the entire details of the new system which was to be substituted for the old. He himself believed that if they attempted to place on the face of the bill, not only the proposals for the new structure of the court and the new arrangement of its jurisdiction, but all the details with respect to the procedure by which each division of this great court should work out the ends of justice, that task would be found too cumbrous to be effectually carried out within a reasonable time; but that when it had been so worked out it would be found to have all the evils of the old system, which consist in the strictness and binding nature of the mode in which details in our courts have hitherto been stereotyped. Whoever supported a change of this character ought to go as far as, having removed the existing jurisdiction, to indicate plainly the courts which were to take up the work, and the scheme of the bill was of that character. It proposed to establish one supreme court with the whole of the jurisdiction exercised by the existing courts; it defined the number of judges and the number of divisions, and then it dealt, as a matter of detail to be worked out by some external body, with the making of rules which would settle all the details. He doubted whether, if all the details referred to were mentioned on the face of the bill, it would be capable of being passed into an Act of Parliament. With reference to equity and common law he maintained, however, that there was at the bottom of the course of procedure in the courts of equity and the common law courts an essential difference which no form could alter. Those who were engaged in the equity courts were employed in arguing before a judge; those who were engaged in the courts of law for the most part had to plead before a jury, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses. There were some gentlemen in the profession who had great aptitude for the one and not for the other of those functions. So long as witnesses continued to be examined in open court there would be a class of advocates who would devote themselves to a class of business in which experience had made them expert. Whatever alteration, therefore, might be made in procedure, the result would remain, that two classes of advocates would be required. The bill provided that all the offices connected with the issue of writs should be handed over to the High Court, while it was provided by another section that all proceedings should be instituted in that court. All, therefore, that Lord Westbury desired was in reality done by the bill, his objection, in truth, being that it was not done on the face of it, but was left to be done by means of rules and orders. Now, so long as the substance and subject-matter of cases remained different, so long would one form of procedure be proper for one form of case, and a different form for another. It was by no means desirable to have one uniform procedure which might be fit or unfit for particular cases. He approved, in conclusion, of leaving the details of the arrangement of business to be worked out by some external body, whether that body were the judges or the Committee of Council.—The Lord Chancellor could not promise to introduce into the bill all the rules and regulations by which the High Court was to be regulated, because he did not believe that any could be introduced into the bill which would be useful or effective. As to the names of the courts, he agreed in the advisability of removing as early as possible all prejudices which might cling to those names, and tend to mislead the public and practitioners. There was therefore a clause in the bill providing that the new divisions should be designated by their present names or by such others as her Majesty in Council might thereafter appoint. He did not think it necessary or decorous to say that her Majesty should make the change, but he did deem it desirable to intimate an expectation on the part of Parliament that these designations would be altered as soon as might be convenient. He believed the reform might be effected this session without difficulty, and should greatly regret its being postponed for another year in consequence of a question being raised as to whether the code of procedure should form part of the bill itself. The bill was not a mere skeleton bill, it defined all that the Court had to do. Lord Westbury had very truly said that one great grievance that suitors had suffered from was that when people had been brought up to a particular system of procedure, they were unable to emancipate themselves from its cramped rules. Now they were anxious that, as far as possible, all forms of procedure should be similar; but they had provided against the inconvenience of their becoming stereotyped. The authority which framed the rules in the first instance might from time to time alter them as the exigency of the moment should require, laying them before Parliament in each case, so that the Legislature might step in and arrest the course of anything which might tend rather to produce mischief than benefit. In this way they hoped to secure a perfect code which could not be departed from except through the medium of the like machinery. As to the Home Circuit all that was proposed now was permissive power to suitors to get their cases tried in London instead of on the Home Circuit. An enormous amount of business was now thrown on the last town of the Home Circuit through London suitors resorting to it in the hope of obtaining a more speedy trial than could be obtained in London through faults which this bill proposed to cure. It had been remarked that the line of procedure was not sufficiently indicated to those who had the framing of the rules. That was a very proper point for those who had charge of the bill to reconsider; but he could not hold out any hope of introducing the suggestions required into the bill. His Lordship then proposed that the House should go into committee on clause 3 (constituting the new courts) and then report progress.—Lord Cairns understood that the judges desired an opportunity of considering the alteration proposed to be made in the bill.—Ultimately the Lord Chancellor agreed to a postponement of the committee to allow time for a communication with the judges.

May 2.—The Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill was read a first time.

Magisterial Qualification.—A bill by the Earl of Albemarle, to abolish the landed qualification, was read a first time.

May 3.—The Bankruptcy Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

The County Courts Buildings Bill passed through committee.

Abolition of Sequestrations for Debt.—A bill by the Bishop of Winchester, to abolish sequestrations for debt, and to provide a more effectual mode of securing the payment of the debts of beneficed clergymen, was read a first time.

May 5.—The Medical Act (1868) Amendment Bill was read a second time.

The County Court Buildings Bill.—The report of amendments was agreed to.

Sale of Land in Ireland.—Lord Dunsany called attention to a case mentioned in the newspapers, in which he said that the decision of the Encumbered Estates Court had been practically overruled by "Rory of the Hills." Might not much hardship result from the forced sale of property in certain parts of Ireland, when a fair price could not be got. Ought there not to be some legislation in this matter, and ought not sales in the Encumbered Estates Court to be suspended for a time?—Lord Dufferin said the case alluded to had been entirely misrepresented. As to a suspensory Act, it would place in a very unfortunate position persons who, being mortgagees of property, would be unable to receive either principal or interest. There was no reason whatever for placing those persons who might in the future be in the habit of purchasing in the Landed Estates Court in a different position from those who had already purchased in that court.

Irish Records.—Lord Talbot de Malahide asked the Master of the Rolls—to whom the country was much indebted for his exertions in arranging, classifying, and rendering accessible to the public the valuable records of the kingdom,—whether there being unfortunately great gaps in the Irish collection, particularly in the earlier periods, whereas in England an enormous collection of the most valuable records connected with Ireland had been accumulated, running back to the time of Henry II.—if the originals could not be parted with, could not copies be made and deposited in the Irish Office.—Lord Romilly said nothing would be more easy than to have full and complete copies of all the Irish records made and sent to Ireland, but the expense would be very considerable. Copies of the documents would not be of very much value, unless accompanied by a chronological catalogue and resumé.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

April 29.—The Convict Spinnaker.—Sir G. Jenkinson called attention to the Home Secretary's commutation of the sentence in this case. He objected to the Home Secretary sitting ex officio as a court of appeal.—Mr. R. Fowler said the whole subject should be left in the hands of the Home Secretary, the House not being the proper place for discussing the guilt of a murderer.—Mr. C. Gilpin drew the inference that capital punishment ought to be abolished.—The Home Secretary said he never overruled the decision of a judge without the fullest approbation on the part of the judge himself. The petitions with which he was besieged were only sent to the judge if on close scrutiny they disclosed substantial reasons. Attempts were often made to induce him to interfere in cases where evidence had been kept back. To such cases he paid no attention. But in the present case, the prisoner being poor and ignorant and incapable of properly defending himself, evidence was afterwards adduced that he was subject to a dangerous hallucination, evidence of which the judge (Mellor, J.) said that had it been before the jury they would probably have decided differently.

The Tornado Case.—Mr. Bentinck called attention to this case.—The Attorney-General said the general principle applicable to cases of this kind was that we had a right to interfere and demand redress from a foreign Government if we were really satisfied that some British subjects had suffered a wrong for which that Government was responsible, and had failed to obtain redress. But we could not prescribe to foreign countries what exactly ought to be the procedure of their tribunals, and how those tribunals ought to be constructed. Neither could we measure the precise time within which their proceedings should be taken and concluded. If we were satisfied that, on the whole, there had been a failure of justice, that the party alleging the grievance had not been heard, and that what ought to be the essential rules of justice in all countries had not been observed, then, and not till then, were we called upon to demand redress. It appeared that beyond doubt the Tornado was a privateer or engaged in a contraband adventure. The question was whether there was before the Spanish tribunals evidence on which they could decide that this vessel was a fair prize. He thought there was such evidence. Consequently the ground failed because we had not merits. He was of opinion, however, that there was cause of complaint arising from delay and also from the ill-treatment of the crew. The parties had a right to be heard, but they declined upon the advice of their counsel, doubtless given because counsel knew there was no answer on the merits of the case. As to the rules of procedure with respect to international remonstrances, before a complaint could be made to a Government about the failure of its tribunals it must be shown that the subjects of the complaining Government had resorted to those tribunals, and had failed on account of the manifest disregard of some principle of justice. No such case had been made out in this instance, because after being warned that if they did not appear judgment would be given against them, the parties deliberately declined to appear, preferring, he took it, to have a grievance rather than to state their case.

May 2.—The Irish Land Bill. Committee. Clause 3 resumed.—Mr. Synan moved, but did not press, an amendment substituting sixty-one for thirty-one years as the length of lease exonerating landlords from payment of damages for eviction.—Dr. Ball proposed twenty-one years, but the alteration was rejected by a majority of 290 to 209.—Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson and Mr. G. Gregory proposed leases for lives, and for shorter periods than thirty-one years, if sanctioned by the Court, but the Government objecting the proposals were not pressed.—Mr. S. Ayrton proposed to except all existing yearly tenancies.—Mr. Jessel said the clause did not deal with a 'fundamental, but only with an incidental, right of property, and such rights were being continually interfered with by Parliament. For instance, the extension of the county franchise depreciated the value formerly attaching to small plots of freehold property, which, when offered for sale, were usually recommended on the ground that they conferred a county vote. The unrestricted right to evict was an incidental right of property, and the clause proposed to check capricious eviction by putting a fine upon it. Restrictions upon alienation were common in the old English law. The amendment really struck at the whole principle of the bill.—The proposal was not pressed, but Mr. C. Fortescue consented to a limitation of the existing tenancies to be affected to £100 rateable value and under.—Sir J. Gray moved an amendment to enable landlords to evade the bill by registering their lands under a permissive tenant right.—Debate adjourned.

Conventual and Monastic Institutions. Adjourned debate.—After a discussion, the order for the committee obtained by Mr. Newdegate was discharged (majority 270 to 160).—Mr. Gladstone then carried, by a majority of 348 to 57, a motion for a select committee to inquire into the state of the law relating to monastic institutions and the terms on which they hold their property.—A proposal being made to include Anglican establishments, Mr. Gladstone replied that the inquiry already included all convents and monasteries, in whatever community.

May 3.—Benefit Building Societies.—A bill by Mr. Gourley was read a first time.

The Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Bill passed through committee.

May 4.—The Women's Disabilities Bill.—Mr. Jacob Bright moved the second reading. He said that if the bill passed into law, women being householders, paying rates, and having their names in the rate-book, would have votes in the election of members of Parliament for boroughs, and would also have votes for county members, if they were holders of houses in counties rated at £12 and upwards, or if they possessed any description of property now entitling men to vote for counties. The largest proportion of women among the municipal voters was Bath, where there was one woman to 3·8 men on the burgess-roll. The smallest proportion was in Walsall, where there was one woman to 22·9 men. In Bristol the proportion was one female to seven; in Manchester one to six; in Newcastle one to eight; and in York one to seven. The number of persons he now proposed to admit to the franchise was so small that there could be no apprehension but that the male sex would still be predominant. He advocated the claim on the ground of public justice. Something like an answer would be given to it if it could be shown that women did not bear some of the burdens borne by men; but such was not the fact. It would be said that women did not take a part in defending the country; and he replied that men were not bound to defend their country. The business of defence was voluntary with the men, and the women contributed to the public Exchequer some portion of the money which enabled the State to maintain men for its defence. Moreover, some women had performed services in the hospital, almost as necessary as those rendered in the camp, and women would ever be found ready for that kind of service. Great anxiety had always been shown by the men to possess the franchise, because they felt that they ought to have a control over the expenditure of the revenue which was raised by the taxes they were called on to pay, because the laws passed by Parliament affected the whole of the people, and because exclusion from the franchise was like a mark of moral inferiority. Was there any reason which men urged for possessing the franchise which did not apply with equal or greater force to the case of women? The married woman in this country was, according to the law, in the position of a negro in the Southern States of America before the Civil War. She had not the control of any portion of her property, nor the possession of one farthing of her earnings. Her husband, however unintelligent and worthless, had the absolute control of her and her money. What was the position of a woman who lost her husband? If he died intestate the law protected her, and gave her a certain portion of the income of his property. If he did not die intestate she was left to his justice and mercy. He did not deny that the majority of women were treated with fairness in that respect, but many cases might be cited of the contrary. He merely pointed to these inequalities, and reminded the House that they had been made by a section of the community, because the other section was entirely without influence. It required ten times the provocation a man required before a woman could obtain a divorce. A woman had no control over her children after they were seven years of age. The husband might take them from her. In April, 1866, Mr. Disraeli said: "I have always been of opinion that if there is to be universal suffrage women have as much right to a vote as men. A woman having property ought to have a vote in a county in which she may have manorial courts, and sometimes act as a churchwarden." He had a claim on the Liberal party. He asked not for liberality but justice. He did not believe the change would affect us in the balance of parties. Why, having given women municipal votes should they deny them the Parliamentary franchise? There was a very general movement in favour of the bill throughout the three kingdoms; witness the petitions presented in its favour.—Colonel Sykes, in supporting the bill, was not disposed to indulge in any sentimentalities with regard to women. The question was a practical one of property qualification. Women were just as capable of exercising the franchise as men, and had an equal right to it.—Mr. Scourfield queried whether the women of England wished for this privilege. He had endeavoured to collect some evidence on this point in an independent way. He had asked the question of many women, and the almost invariable answer he had received was that they would rather not have this privilege, as it was called, conferred upon them. They all knew how petitions were got up. The vocation of woman was a high one; nurtured under totally different circumstances from men, they made life endurable. At present their influence was most effective for good, but if they went into the same line of business as men there would be nothing to desire but the speedy consummation of Dr. Cumming's prophecy.—Mr. W. Fowler had shown he was not wanting in sympathy with women by the steps he had taken to amend laws which did them grievous injustice, but he was not prepared to require them to partake in the strife of political life. He did not deem it a disability that women had no power to vote; it was rather a privilege to be free from the obligation. Women could influence their husbands and brothers in political matters; indeed, their influence in this way was great already. And where was this question to stop? If women were endowed with the right to vote there was no reason why they should not be elected to sit in Parliament. And if single women were to have votes, why not married women also?—Sir C. Dilke said the opposition to the bill was really founded on a belief in the incapacity of women; but if a woman could be queen, could not she vote?—Mr. Beresford Hope observed that it was not fair to argue that because no petitions had been presented by women against this bill, that all women were, therefore, in favour of a measure of this kind, because to most women the very act of petitioning or engaging in any public matter of that kind was objectionable. If unmarried women were entitled to the franchise on account of the property which they possessed, it should equally follow that married women who held property to their own separate use were entitled to vote. And yet the supporters of this bill were not sufficiently consistent to extend the principle of the measure to that extent. If men's political privileges were shared by women, it should also follow that men's political burdens should be shared by them, and he would ask how the advocates of this measure would like to make women liable to serve on juries such as those which were accustomed to deal with the matters which came before Lord Penzance's Court for decision? It had been asked whether there was any reason why voting should be confined to those who wore one article of dress, while those who wore a different article should be debarred from the privilege, and he could perfectly understand the validity of such an argument if elections occurred exclusively in the Highlands. He believed that by enfranchising a few women they would be placing the few so enfranchised in an unenviable position, while by enfranchising the many they would, in questions where impulse, unreasoning theory, and sentiment were opposed to political economy, fail to get as business-like, calm, and judicial legislation as they did under the present system.—Dr. Playfair contended that all the supporters of this bill asked for was simply to give to the principle which was recognised in the municipal franchise and all other questions of citizenship its legitimate development, and to take women out of the list of incapable citizens, who, besides the female portion of our population, included none but idiots, lunatics, criminals, and minors. It was unwise that so much property as that which was possessed by single women in this country should be unrepresented. The world had benefited very much by the sympathies of women. He could not find any argument against the measure except the usual laissez-faire argument that the world had gone on very well without women taking part in politics, and why introduce them now. Women, it was said, did not want the franchise. It was quite true they had not pulled down Hyde-park railings but that a large number of them had demanded the suffrage in a constitutional way. Besides, it was the very imperfect education which women received that prevented them from seeing the importance of this question.—Sir G. Jenkinson supported the bill, not so much on the ground of the personal rights of women, as of the rights of property. He could not understand why women in the possession of property should be denied the exercise of the usual rights of property as far as having a voice in the representation of it went. Mr. Beresford had talked of the persecution women would undergo if they had votes. But his own experience was that women were as well able as men to meet persecution and to inflict it too. There was one higher ground on which he supported the motion. Women said that men monopolised all legislation, and that they themselves had no voice in the making of laws. That was a good reason why the House should not now ignore this appeal to the justice of the British Parliament.—Mr. Muntz observed that it was said, for example, that the position of women among us was like that of the slaves in the Southern States; but for his part he believed that the men were the slaves and the women the mistresses. But why should a ratepayer of many thousands a year be prevented from voting for a member of Parliament merely on account of a difference of sex?—Sir H. Croft inclined to agree with "Mr. Punch" that "those who are wanting women's rights are wanting women's charms."—Mr. Bruce would ask the House to delay the progress of this measure, because the question was too large to be settled off-hand, and it required mature consideration. If they gave women the right to vote for the election of members of Parliament, how could they refuse them the right, if otherwise qualified, of sitting in that House?—On a division, the second reading was carried by a majority of 124 to 91, and the committee fixed for Wednesday next.

The Public Prosecutors Bill.—Mr. Burke moved the second reading.—Mr. Rathbone said the provisions could be carried out without much expense to rate-payers. The Scotch system had not been adopted because it had been thought inadvisable to adopt in England any system which would throw on a Procurator Fiscal that work which the police and magistracy now did so well.—The Attorney-General agreed that this was a question of such magnitude and importance as might properly warrant its being dealt with by the Government, but the Government had so many measures in hand this session. The Government did approve the principle of the bill, though he did not commit himself to all its details. The system of public prosecutors was adopted in almost all continental countries, in America, and also to some extent in Ireland and Scotland, and thus there was made out a conclusive case in favour of supplying this great omission in the administration of the criminal law of this country. Many offences were not prosecuted at all, while others were only prosecuted inefficiently. There was, again, a class of cases which properly resulted in acquittals, and frequently occasioned actions for malicious prosecutions. Another class was that of collusive prosecutions or those in which witnesses were bought off or induced to leave the country. In another class the criminal law was abused for the enforcement of civil rights, but further, it frequently happened that a prosecutor cared very little about his case, and it was taken up by a policeman, who acted not only as the principal witness but also as the prosecutor. In its leading features this bill seemed to carry out the recommendations of the Committee of 1855, which had reported on this subject, but as there were in it some deviations the bill might be properly considered by a select committee. Personally, he should have been very glad if the superintendence of the department of public prosecutions could have been entrusted to anyone other than the Attorney-General, but if the office was imposed upon him he would endeavour to discharge the duties to the best of his ability.—Mr. Hibbert thought that the public prosecutors should be nominated by the local authorities.—Mr. Collins desired the same, provided the Lord Chancellor had a vote.—The bill was then read a second time.

The Felons Property Bill passed through committee.

The Mortgage Debentures Act (1865) Amendment Bill passed through committee.

May 5.—The Irish Land Bill.—Committee. Clause 3 resumed.—Sir J. Gray, at the request of Mr. Gladstone, withdrew his amendment creating a permissive tenant right, in order to move it subsequently as a substantive clause. Several other amendments having been proposed and negatived or withdrawn, the clause, as amended, was agreed to after a protest from Lord Ilcho. Clause 4 (compensation for improvement).—Mr. Disraeli made and withdrew a proposal to limit the claim for compensation to improvements made twenty years before the making of the claim, instead of twenty years before the passing of the Act.—Mr. Kavanagh proposed to exclude from compensation reclamation of land and permanent improvements made twenty years before the Act.—The amendment was rejected by a majority of 230 to 184.—An amendment by Mr. R. Torrens to require that compensation shall not be given unless the improvement has increased the general value of the estate, was rejected by a majority of 225 to 156.—An amendment by Mr. Chaplin to omit the exception in favour of improvements made within two years after the passing of the Act, was rejected by a majority of 212 to 153.—Debate adjourned.

The Beverley and Bridgewater Disfranchisement Bill passed through committee, with the addition of a new clause, by Mr. Pemberton, providing that no person who may be prosecuted for bribery shall be disfranchised until or unless found guilty.

The Norwich Voters Disfranchisement Bill passed through committee.

The Attorneys' and Solicitors' Remuneration Bill was read a third time and passed.

IRELAND.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

May 2.—In re Fortune's Trusts.

The executors of the deceased had lodged in court a sum of £400, the amount of a legacy payable to a gentleman named Brennan, resident in England, who refused to execute a formal deed of release for the money, insisting that a simple receipt was sufficient. The executors persisted in requiring that he should execute a release, and pay the costs of it, amounting to £4 15s. 6d., and, as he still refused, stating that he did so on principle, and that he was quite willing to give the interest on the legacy, which would be nearly twice the amount in dispute, in charity to the poor of Waterford, the executors, after a long and angry correspondence, brought the money into court, under the Trustee Relief Act.

O'Hagan, Q.C., for Mr. Brennan, applied for an order declaring him entitled to the money in court, and his costs.

Harris, Q.C., for the executors, resisted the claim to costs.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR declared Mr. Brennan entitled to the amount lodged, with £7 for his costs.*

The temporary appointment of Mr. Horatio Mansfield, barrister-at-law, as deputy stipendiary magistrate of Liverpool, having continued for six months, ceased on the 30th April. The health of Mr. Stamford Raffles, the stipendiary magistrate, has been so far restored that he intends resuming his duties in the course of another week.

Mr. George Brett, solicitor, Town Clerk of Salford, has intimated that he intends to resign his office at the close of the present session of Parliament, in order to devote himself more fully to his private practice. Mr. Brett was certificated in Hilary Term, 1852, and is a member of the Incorporated Law Society and of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association.

OBITUARY.

MR. W. READE.

Mr. W. Reade, barrister-at-law (formerly the owner of Alderholt-park, Dorset), died on the 30th April at his residence at Ringwood, Hants, aged sixty-five years. Mr. Reade, who graduated at Queen's College, Oxford, was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in June, 1831, and joined the Western Circuit. About nine years later he was appointed a Commissioner of Bankrupts for Bath and Wells, a post he held till the new law abolished his and similar commissions. He enjoyed the intimate friendship of many eminent leaders, several of whom became judges. He was one of the original members of the Reform Club, and up to this year a member of the Oxford and Cambridge Club.

MR. A. LYLE.

The death of Mr. Acheson Lyle, Q.C., of the Irish bar, took place at The Oaks, his seat near Londonderry, on the 26th of April, at the age of seventy-six years. He was the second son of the late Samuel Lyle, Esq., of The Lodge, co. Londonderry. He was born in 1795, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated B.A. in 1815. He was called to the bar in Ireland in Trinity Term, 1818, and for some years acted as Chief Remembrancer to the Court of Exchequer, and more recently was a master in the Irish Court of Chancery. This office he resigned in 1860, on being appointed, by Lord Carlisle, to be Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the county of Londonderry. At the time this appointment caused some controversy in the House of Lords, but was defended by the Government of the day.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

LAW ASSOCIATION.

At the monthly meeting, held at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, on Thursday, the 7th ult., a grant of £50 was made to the daughter of a deceased member, two sums were voted to the daughters of deceased non-members, the annual general court was fixed for the 19th of May, it was determined to hold a dinner for forwarding the interests of the Association during the present year, and other business was transacted.

SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The usual monthly meeting of the board of directors of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association was held at the Law Institution, London, on Wednesday last, the 4th inst.; Mr. W. Strickland Cookson in the chair. The other directors present were Messrs. Burton, Hedger, Haycock, Monckton, Smith, and Young (Mr. Eiffe, Secretary). A sum of £25 was granted in relief of necessitous non-members' families. Eight new annual subscribers were admitted members of the Association, and other general business transacted.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society on Tuesday, the 3rd of May, Mr. Hepburn in the chair, the question for discussion was No. 461. Legal:—A railway company conveys goods at mileage rates, subject to the condition that "the company will not be liable for any loss or damage to the goods, however caused." The goods are materially damaged in carriage, owing to the negligence of the company's servants. Is the above condition a good answer to an action against the company for damages for the injury to the goods? (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, s. 7; Simons v. Great Western Railway Company, 18 C. B. 805, 2 C. B. N. S. 620; Peck v. North Staffordshire Railway Company, 11 W. R. 1023; Allday v. Great Western Railway Company, 13 W. R. 43; Routh v. North Eastern Railway Company, L. R. 2 Ex. 173, 15 W. R. 695.)

Mr. G. W. Byrne opened the debate in the affirmative, and Mr. Russell in the negative. After a well-sustained discussion the question was decided in the negative by a small majority.

The Hon. Arthur G. Macpherson, a puisne judge of the High Court of Judicature in Bengal, left Calcutta on leave on the 16th of March, and has arrived in England.

COURT PAPERS.

ORDER IN CHANCERY.

Whereas by the 5th of the Consolidated Orders of this court, rule 6, it is provided that the Lord Chancellor may from time to time by special order direct the offices to be closed on days other than those mentioned in the first rule of the said order: And whereas Saturday the 28th day of May has been appointed for the celebration of her Majesty's birthday, and such event has been heretofore observed as a general holiday in the several offices of this court, his Lordship doth therefore order that the several offices of this court be closed on Saturday the 28th day of May, and that this order be entered and set up in the several offices of this court.

(Signed) HATHERLEY, C.

QUEEN'S BENCH.

This court will on Friday the 13th, and Saturday the 14th days of May instant hold sittings and will proceed in disposing of the cases in the new trial, special, and crown papers, and any other matters then pending and will give judgment in cases then standing for judgment.

COMMON PLEAS.

Sittings at Nisi Prius in Middlesex and London, before the Right Hon. Sir WILLIAM BOVILL, Knt., Lord Chief Justice of her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas, at Westminster, in and after Trinity Term, 1870.

IN TERM.

Middlesex.

Friday May 27 | Thursday June 2
 Thursday June 9

The Court will not sit in London during term.

AFTER TERM.

Middlesex. | London.

Friday June 17 | Friday July 1

The Court will sit at Nisi Prius on Mondays at half-past 10 o'clock, and on all other days at 10 o'clock.

Mr. Henry Pownall, chairman of the Middlesex magistrates, has resigned that office, in consequence of severe illness.

FOND OF THE COUNTY COURT.—A plaintiff at the Lambeth County Court a few days ago said he was suing his defendant for the twelfth time in three years. The plaintiff had let a small tenement three years at 3s. 6d. per week, and the whole of the rent has been paid through the court. A more extraordinary fact still was mentioned, namely, that so far as plaintiff knew the defendant had never made any use of the tenement whatever, and when applied to for rent his invariable answer was that he would pay no other way but through the Court. The plaintiff seemed highly amused at this mode of collecting his rent, as also were the judge and audience. Doubtless everybody appreciated the patriotism of a tax-payer who thus voluntarily pays taxes in the shape of court fees equal to the income tax on over £200 per annum.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The transactions of the past week have been rather limited in all the markets, but the funds, though at one time they suffered a decline in price, closed at a recovery. Foreign securities have been somewhat flat. The new Japanese loan, which was so eagerly subscribed for, has fallen to a discount of 3½. Telegraph shares have gone down in the market, but the average of the general share market shows a slight improvement. In railways there is not much alteration, but Caledonians have experienced a fall in consequence of that company notifying the issue of a million of new ordinary stock at 70, payable by instalments, as well as one-third of that sum in debentures. These stocks, however, very soon began to recover.

At the annual meeting of the Sovereign Life Assurance Company, held on Thursday, it was stated that 458 policies, averaging £680 each, had been issued in 1869, assuring $311,250, and yielding a new premium income of £8,843.

The New York Life Insurance Company established in 1841, publishes an official certificate signed by the superintendent of the insurance department of the State of New York, vouching for the soundness of the company, and the integrity with which its business is conducted.

A meeting of the Law Amendment Society was held at the society's rooms, in Adam-street, Adelphi, on the 2nd inst., Mr. Mellish, Q.C., in the chair. The subject of consideration was the Lord Chancellor's High Court of Justice Bill. Mr. G. Hastings hoped a general meeting of the bar would be convened to consider the bill.—Mr. M. Chambers Q.C., could not recommend that course, his experience being that such meetings never produced any definite resolution. He was for an immediate legislation, leaving defects in the new system to be amended subsequently.—Mr. Quain, Q.C., said the particulars of a code of procedure could not be inserted in a bill, but the broad principles might.—The chairman said there could be no doubt as to the necessity of effecting the substance of the reforms recommended by the Judicature Commissioners. The difficulty would be in the particulars, not the broad principles. The whole gist of the matter lay in the framing of a code of procedure, but he did not see why the bill should not pass this year, not to come into operation till 1871, a properly paid commission being appointed to frame a code of procedure by that time. If Parliament approved the code, they could appoint a body, of judges or others, to amend it from time to time. He deprecated the passing of the bill in its present form; it contained some sections unlike anything he had ever seen in any Act of Parliament. He thought a system of procedure should be framed before the Act was finally passed.—In conclusion, the meeting passed a resolution expressing a general approval of the bill.

MIDDLE TEMPLE.—The Benchers have published an "order of Parliament," made during the present term, with regard to the annual payment for "duties" by the members of this society. There has been great difficulty in collecting the annual payment of £1 from the large number of gentlemen who do not practice, and in many cases have been called to the Bar without any intention of prosecuting their profession. It has, therefore, been determined by the Benchers that every member of the society who, after Trinity Term, 1870, is called to the Bar, or takes out a certificate to practice under the Bar, shall pay down a sum of £12, in place of the yearly charge for "duties." An amendment has also been made in the "order of Parliament" of the 2nd of June, 1865, with the view of permitting any member who now wishes to pay a sum in commutation of "duties" to do so on payment of £12 less 5s. for every year from the date of his call, or from three years after his admission. No commutation, however, is to be made for less than £5.—Times.

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, MAY 14, 1870.

THE CRIPPLED STATE of the Court of Appeal in Chancery seems, if we may judge from sundry observations which have lately appeared in the public papers, to have at last attracted the notice of the public, and we may, perhaps, reasonably hope that something will at no distant period be done to remedy the evil. As soon as it became definitely known that the Government did not intend to fill up Lord Justice Selwyn's place, we pointed out the inconveniences which might be expected to result from so ill-advised a parsimony, but the Times and the Chancellor of the Exchequer were too strong, and "the saving of £6,000 a-year" a bribe too great, and accordingly the claims of the suitors in equity have been unheeded.

Now it turns out, as we understand, that this saving is, without legislative interference, purely imaginary; that Lord Justice Selwyn's successor will be entitled to his salary as from Lord Justice Selwyn's death; and that all that the Government will have gained by keeping the court for the best part of the legal year in a state of inefficiency will have been the right to hand over to the fortunate individual upon whom they may eventually confer the vacant office nine months' salary (£4,500), for which he will have done exactly nothing.

The Appellate Jurisdiction Bill, if it should pass into law, would save them from this difficulty, because by that bill no new Lord Justice is to be appointed, and the salary of the Judge of Appeal to be appointed at once under its provisions to do the work of a Lord Justice would of course commence only from his appointment. Our readers can therefore easily comprehend, first, that the Government is especially anxious to carry the bill in question without delay (and therein, on totally different grounds, they have our best wishes); and secondly, that so long as there is any reasonable hope that the bill will become law in the course of this session no new Lord Justice will be appointed.

We believe that, if the bill should eventually be withdrawn, no further time will be lost in filling up the vacancy.

THE PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (BALLOT) BILL, which has been introduced into the House of Commons, is important, not only as a political measure, but also in its effect upon election law. To discuss its political merits or demerits scarcely comes within our province, but the details of the measure and the machinery by which its objects are to be effected will have a special interest to our readers. The bill not being as yet printed, we cannot now do more than draw attention to a few points. It is proposed that the ballot shall be taken in such a manner as to admit of a subsequent scrutiny. This is to be done by means of a number on the counterfoil of the voting paper. It is certainly important that there should be some means of checking the result declared by the returning officer, as without it there would be constant doubts as to the fairness of the proceeding. We do not imagine, however, that scrutinies properly so called are likely to be very frequent. It will be remembered that at the last general election though a scrutiny was prayed for in several petitions, there were only about three cases in which it was really gone into. If we understand the scheme rightly, the public or at all events, the candidates and their agents will be able, after the election, to inspect the voting papers so as to see that the numbers for each candidate are correctly entered, and also to see the list of electors who have received voting papers and have voted. They will not, however, be allowed to see the counterfoils by which the papers of particular voters are identified. The result is that upon a scrutiny the candidates would have to object to the votes of persons whose votes they believe themselves able to show to be bad, without knowing for certain which way they have voted. The class of persons who vote without a right to do so, and whose votes can be struck off on a scrutiny, are exactly the class whose statements as to the manner in which they had voted, would not be very reliable. Thus the difficulties which at present exist to hinder a defeated candidate from obtaining a seat upon a scrutiny, would be increased and not diminished. The cases in which scrutinies are now usually successful are those in which some one wholesale objection applies to a large number of voters, such, for instance, as the second Bewdley petition in 1869. In such cases, under the present system, the manner in which the voters have voted being known, it can now be seen beforehand that if a favourable decision on the one point can be obtained, it will turn the election. But with the secret system this can never be known, so that a scrutiny will be even more of a speculation than it is at present, and so expensive that it is not likely to be often resorted to. There is, however, one new point which will arise, and that is as to the reception or rejection of voting papers. No person who has not actual experience in such matters can tell what mistakes are made by persons such as constitute a large proportion of our voters in filling up the simplest form. The plan proposed is that the voter shall simply have to strike out the names of those for whom he does not vote, leaving in the names of one or more candidates not exceeding in number the number for whom he has a right to vote. This certainly is simple enough in theory, but we venture to think that in practice numerous mistakes will be made, especially when it is remembered that the act is to be done in secret, and that no assistance can be given to the voter. It is probable that one of the results of the new system will be that more candidates will go to the poll than heretofore, and that will, of course, increase the voter's difficulty. Of course, objections to the voting papers will be patent to the candidate's agents, and we imagine that if the Government bill passes the scrutinies of the future will principally be brought where objections can be taken to the reception or rejection of voting papers by the returning officer.

THE MARRIAGE WITH DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL passed through committee last week, and will, in all probability, be soon forwarded to the House of Lords, whence it has already been ejected four times, though by lessening majorities. There being no Scriptural prohibition of such marriages, the question remains one of mere expediency. As a legal journal we feel it our province to treat of parliamentary measures rather from the jurist's than the political economist's point of view—to comment on changes in the practical rules and machinery by which justice is to be administered, rather than to criticise the abstract merits of legislative changes at large. Yet we cannot forbear from adding our voice to the yearly increasing multitude which urges the expediency of this reform. We have perused attentively from time to time the arguments which its opponents have advanced, but we have met with nothing which we could imagine a reasonable man advancing seriously. Where a married sister is dead and the husband and the surviving sister desire to renew the tie, it will be a boon to enable them to do so; it is said, however, that the possibility of such a union will estrange the parties during the wife's lifetime, and after her death will either deprive the children of the care of their aunt, or turn the good aunt into a bad stepmother. These objections are very fanciful, and, we believe, that all people, women included, are much more sensible than the objectors apparently would admit them to be; nor can we understand the principle on which it is supposed that the sister, who of all women in the world is likely to be a tender guardian for the motherless children, should become deteriorated and soured in consequence of the marriage, which makes it her express duty to care for them.

In the early Christian Church the feeling upon the subject of marriage seems to have bordered upon fanaticism. That a widower should marry was highly disapproved of, and that he should marry a third time was accounted simply abominable. Ecclesiastics being the first English lawyers, many strangely inconvenient restrictions were imported into the English law, which in process of time dropped simply from their inconvenience. The statute 28 Hen. 8, c. 7, however, into the history of which we need not now enter, forbade marriage with a deceased wife's sister, declaring such marriages to be "contrary to God's law;" the statute itself is repealed, but its declarations were repeated in the subsequent Acts of 28 Hen. 8, c. 16 and 32 Hen. 8, c. 38. It was still, however, the law that marriages within the prohibited degrees of both affinity and consanguinity were not actually void but merely voidable by sentence of an ecclesiastical court, and that only if the proceedings were begun during the lifetime of the parties. Lord Lyndhurst's Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54, placed the law upon a different footing by enacting that no marriages made previously to that Act should be annulled for affinity, but that future marriages between prohibited degrees of affinity should be absolutely void. And in Brook v. Brook (9 H. L. 193), the House of Lords decided that as regards marriages contracted in foreign countries between persons domiciled in England, the lex loci contractus is binding only as regards the solemnities with which the marriage is to be celebrated, and not so far as to legalise a marriage between parties whom the English law has forbidden to intermarry.

Such being the short history of the matter, Mr. T. Chambers proposes (saving all questions relating to property which may depend on previous marriages, and saving all cases in which after the marriage with the deceased wife's sister either of the parties has lawfully married any other person) to authorise marriage with deceased wife's sister both in futuro and retrospectively. We are aware that our marriage law demands a thorough reconsideration en bloc, and we are in general decided opponents of piecemeal amendments. In this instance, however, we should prefer to have this change made at once rather than continue the present state of hardship for an indefinite period, though we do not see why marriage with a deceased husband's brother should not be legalised at the same time. While, however, we earnestly desire to see this alteration in the law, we cannot but disapprove highly of making it by a retrospective enactment. Just or unjust, the law is still the law: we must uphold it in practice, though we may amend it for the future. To sanction previous breaches of the law in the manner proposed by this bill cannot fail to have a most unsalutary influence, whether it be regarded as a precedent, or as an incentive to a small esteem of other prohibitions.

THE RECENT REDUCTION of the Government establishments eastward of London caused considerable numbers of people to remove, some to great distances. As these removals were preceded by want of employment, it is hardly surprising that many of these people left debts behind them. The tradesmen have been suing for their debts at the Greenwich and Woolwich County Courts, obtaining the leave of the registrar to send the summonses for service to distant places, as provided by the rules of practice, on the ground that the contracts arose within the district, or that the debtors had resided there within the last six months. Numbers of these debtors on receiving their summonses have written to the court complaining that they have been greatly overcharged, and also alleging that they are at the mercy of their creditors because they are unable to bear the expense of travelling long distances to defend the actions, some of them adding that loss of their newly-acquired employment would follow even a short absence from it. Some of the writers of the letters charge their creditors with having deliberately made overcharges in the belief that the distance of the debtors rendered defence impossible.

In a matter like this it is easier to see the hardship than to devise the remedy. Clearly the creditor is entitled, not only by the rules but by the natural justice of the case, to sue a removing debtor in the district in which the debt was contracted. Whatever compassion may be felt for persons suddenly and unexpectedly deprived of their livelihood, it is indisputable that the debtor who removes to a distance leaving unpaid debts behind him is not entitled to complain of the inconvenience of returning to look after his own interests. Still such circumstances afford a strong temptation to unprincipled tradesmen to swindle the defaulters by overcharges which they will probably be unable to resist, and it is very desirable that some remedy should be devised for this. We trust that the point may not be lost sight of in the county court reform bill now in preparation under the auspices of the Judicature Commission. Perhaps a variation of the existing rule which entitles a defendant to treble costs if he is sued again after judgment has been given in his favour, would meet such cases as those of the Greenwich fugitives. The variation might take something like this shape:—Where a summons is served out of the district of the issuing court and the defendant admits in writing a portion of the demand a certain number of days before the day of hearing, let him be entitled to treble costs unless the plaintiff makes out a case for more than the sum admitted. If the same principle, but with only the ordinary costs, were applied to all cases where part of a claim is admitted; and the defendant has not been summoned from a "foreign district," it would be a great check upon wilful overcharges.

IT SEEMS THAT AFTER ALL the Supreme Court of the United States are not going to re-open their decision against the validity of the "legal tender" Act. The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in such cases extends, as American law papers inform us, only to those cases in which the decision of the State Court is against the validity of the enactment. Therefore if any one of the "greenback" persuasion can induce one of the State Courts to give a decision in favour of the Act, there would be no appeal from such a ruling. Whether such a decision is possible after the solemn determination of the Supreme Court, is, of course, a matter on which we can form no opinion.

IN PARLIAMENT THIS WEEK there has been a sudden rush to the front by various measures all more or less interesting to our readers. Several of these we notice below. The Women's Disabilities or Parliamentary Franchise Bill was after all thrown out on the order for going into committee, and thus we are again relieved for the present from an, in our opinion, ill-advised measure. We shall notice next week the bill to restrain the sale of next presentations.

ON TUESDAY LAST THE Court of Queen's Bench pronounced sentence on the Bridgwater and Norwich bribery delinquents. Fennelly was sentenced to twelve months imprisonment and a fine of £1,000; Hardiment, already under sentence for bribery at a municipal election, was condemned to six months further imprisonment; Hulme, in consideration of his labouring under a cancerous disease, was not imprisoned, and received only a fine of £100. Of Dr. Kinglake's case the Court thought sufficiently favourable to inflict nothing heavier than a fine of £200. The Lord Chief Justice availed himself of the opportunity of stating that the Court would deem it its duty to subject offenders convicted of future bribery to the most degrading and humiliating form of punishment by refusing to class them as first-class misdemeanants.

The feeling of the legal profession is that these sentences are not one whit too severe. When all classes unite in regarding bribery not only as a crime but as a degrading offence which stamps the offender as contemptible, far more will have been accomplished than can ever be hoped for from the ballot or any other scheme; and nothing will more quickly convince people that the offence is low and degrading than seeing convicted criminals subjected to a low and degrading punishment.

THE COUNCIL OF LAW REPORTING have issued their annual report, from which we are glad to learn that their financial position has much improved. We demur to the statement that the digest lately published has been "found extremely useful to the profession;" the common opinion which has reached our ears being that it is next to impossible to find anything in it.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE ON THE JUDICATURE BILLS.

Lord Chief Justice Cockburn has addressed to the Lord Chancellor a letter on "Our Judicial System," which, though written apparently in his own name alone, must be taken, we apprehend, as embodying the objections of the common law bench to the alterations in the judicature of the country proposed to be effected by the High Court of Justice and Appellate Jurisdiction Bills. Any observations coming from such a quarter must necessarily meet with the utmost respect, and although we are constrained to differ in the main from the Lord Chief Justice, we cannot but feel that there is so much force in what he says as to render it but too probable that his opposition may succeed in postponing legislation on the subject.

The letter is one which requires to be read a second time, and after some little interval, because its nervous and energetic language, which reminds us more of the brilliant member for Southampton than of the Lord Chief Justice of more than ten years standing, rather carries away the reader for the time, so that one is apt not to perceive, at the first reading, upon how narrow a foundation the objections rest. His Lordship admits that the present divided jurisdiction (where it is practically impossible for anyone to know, with anything like certainty, whether, in a multitude of cases, the remedy is exclusively at law, or exclusively in equity, or concurrently in both) is utterly indefensible; and he further admits that, as a matter of principle, whenever the doctrines of law and equity are conflicting, the latter must prevail; and having done so much, he seems to us to have practically yielded the whole point.

The objections raised to the bill by the Lord Chief Justice (apart from the common form plea for investigation, i.e., delay, and from some verbal criticism) appear to be four: 1. The abolition of the distinctive jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench; 2. (And principally) the constitution of the body to whom the duty of making rules and orders is entrusted; 3. The want of more specific legislation as to the principles which should guide these rules; 4. An assumed loss of independence by the courts.

The first of these objections seems to us to strike at the principle of the whole scheme; if nothing more be wanted than to get rid of the difficulty and absurdity caused by the present conflict of jurisdiction between the courts of law and equity, we quite agree with his Lordship that no alteration in the present status or constitution of our courts is required for the purpose, and we have already sketched the outline of a measure which would be sufficient to serve that purpose; but if the idea of the Judicature Commission, upon which this bill is professedly founded, is to be carried into effect at all, it seems to us a necessary consequence that the jurisdiction in criminal cases and matters of prerogative hitherto exercised by the Court of Queen's Bench, should be transferred to the proposed High Court. We think, however, that it might well be enacted that this jurisdiction should be exercised in criminal matters by the Queen's Bench division, and in cases of mandamus, ne exeat regno, and other high prerogative writs, whether granted at present by Chancery or the Queen's Bench (excepting, of course, the writ of injunction, which has practically become an ordinary process of the Court) should be grantable only by the High Court itself, as defined in the bill. This would effectually secure the independence of the Court in these high matters, for as there is but one removable judge—the Chancellor—in the whole Court, there would necessarily be at least six independent judges present to prevent any undue exercise of arbitrary power. It seems to us, indeed, that the idea that the Lord Chancellor would, when acting judicially, be more susceptible of occult and improper influences than an irremovable judge, is somewhat overstrained; but the objection, such as it is, would be completely overcome by the proviso suggested.

The last of his Lordship's objections appears to us perfectly chimerical. Indeed the only even apparent foundation for his statement that it is thereby intended "to swamp common law courts and swallow up the judges of England, leaving the Court of Chancery, though under the new and high sounding name of a High Court of Justice, to reign exclusively supreme," is to be found in the simple fact that the Lord Chancellor is to be (as he must necessarily be) ex officio Lord President of the Court. It is obvious that any scheme for uniting the courts must leave the Lord Chancellor, then as now, at the head of the whole bench. Indeed, it would be much more accurate to describe the scheme as one for merging the Court of Chancery in the common law courts. Four-fifths of the judges of the High Court will be common law judges; four out of its five divisions will be principally occupied with the classes of cases now ordinarily tried at common law; and if at any sitting of the High Court of Justice itself any conflict of opinion should happen to arise, it would be almost inevitable that the equity judges would be found in a minority. But we gather from the sentence which in the Lord Chief Justice's letter immediately follows that which we have quoted above, that his Lordship's idea of "the entire amalgamation of law and equity" consists simply in giving equitable jurisdiction to the superior courts of common law in like manner, though of course without any like limit, as has been done in the case of the county courts. This, however, with great deference to his Lordship, would not be any "amalgamation" at all; it would simply restore to the Court of Exchequer, and confer on the other common law courts, that dual jurisdiction which was found to work so badly, and which the Legislature, with the general approbation of the profession, abolished about thirty years ago. This, indeed, seems to Lord St. Leonards to be the result of the present proposal, and, if we concurred with him in that view, we would certainly also concur in his conclusion thereon, that "the confusion would be terrible."† The Lord Chief Justice seems still to look back with longing towards Lord Campbell's Law and Equity Bill of 1860, which so happily, as we consider, failed, and which this Journal opposed at the time‡ to the utmost of its power. Our opinions upon that proposal are quite unchanged, and we should repel, if applied to ourselves, the charge of inconsistency with which Lord Chief Justice Cockburn does not hesitate to taunt the equity judges, because, having opposed that measure, they support, or are believed to support, this one.

On this part of the case his Lordship suggests a difficulty which appears to us purely imaginary. Least we should be suspected of exaggeration, we give the paragraph in his own words:—

"Much of course must depend on what it is proposed to do. Is it simply to substitute equity for law where the two are in conflict? to convert every court of law into a court of equity, administering justice in civil matters according to the system of law known under the name of equity? to allow a plaintiff to sue, whatever the form of procedure, where and only where equity would acknowledge the right he seeks to enforce, and allow a defendant such a defence, but such a defence alone as equity would hold to be sufficient? or is it further proposed to blend the two systems into one, applying equitable principles to common law rights where, in reason and justice, they ought to be applied, but where, owing to the particular circumstances under which equity jurisdiction has been called into action, they have hitherto failed to be applied? I will illustrate what I mean by a familiar example. In the distribution of assets, where the assets are legal the distribution takes place according to the legal priorities of the different classes of creditors; but if the assets are equitable, and can therefore only be got at through the intervention of equity, the court will disregard the legal priorities and distribute such assets among the creditors pari passu. Again, a court of equity will compel a husband who requires its aid in order to get at equitable estate belonging to the wife, to make a proper settlement on the wife and her children. If the wife's estate be legal, there is no occasion to come to the court, and equity has consequently no power over the husband. I assume in both cases the equitable principle to be the more just and rational, and in reason to be quite as applicable to the legal as to the equitable assets or estate. Is it intended to extend the principle of equity to such a case? I should be glad to find that not only equity was to be made the law, but also that equity itself was to be enlarged so as to meet every case to which it ought to be applied, but I fail to find any indication of legislative intention in the bill."

No doubt there is no such intention in the bill, and it would have been completely foreign to the scope of the bill, however desirable in itself, to have made any such change. The bill proposes, in clear enough terms, we think, to enact that every right now lawfully existing at law or in equity shall be enforceable as heretofore, and that every defence now properly raiseable at law or in equity shall be available as heretofore, with the following exceptions:—(1.) That it shall be no longer a defence that the proceeding is taken in the wrong court; and (2.) that if it appears that there would now be a conflict of decisions on the particular question the view now adopted in equity shall prevail. This may not be all that might be desired, but we would do well to take now what we can get, not unmindful how often it is the case that πλεον ἤμιν πάντος.

His Lordship's other two objections seem to us, however, to stand on a very different footing. We have, indeed, expressed an opinion that the 13th and 14th clauses of the amended bill, if legally carried out, would afford a sufficient guide to the framers of the rules of procedure to enable them to do all that is desired, but then the Lord Chief Justice says, and we cannot but fear that there is some ground for the suggestion, that something more is needed, and that the discretion of that body must be more or less fettered to secure their acting in the desired direction. It may therefore be necessary or expedient to require that in all issues of fact before a jury (and probably in all issues of fact, even when tried by a judge alone, if either party desire it) all the evidence shall be taken vivâ voce in court; and further, as the Lord Chief Justice seems, perhaps not unreasonably, apprehensive that juries themselves may be too frequently dispersed with, to give to either party a right to a jury ex debito justitiæ in every case of disputed fact, and in every case of unliquidated damage, unless the Court should, upon motion, otherwise direct. This would, we think, be much better than either the existing common law rule, where a jury is of course, unless both parties agree to dispense with it, or the rule now prevailing in Chancery, which practically comes to this, that a jury will be refused unless the judge desires its assistance to cut some knot which he feels himself unable to untie. We should also be very glad to see some more definite regulations, such as we have already suggested, as to the nature of the business to be taken by the High Court itself, the Divisional Courts, and single judges, respectively, and something to put an effectual end to the daily increasing exercise of judicial powers by officers of rank inferior to a judge, an evil practice to which the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, has lent ill-omened countenance, and which has increased in Chancery to such an alarming extent that we have lately heard the Master of the Rolls in open court refuse to interfere with "the discretion of the chief clerk." In this respect we have reason to hope much good result from a large infusion of common law ideas into the action of the High Court of Justice.

The remaining objection is one with which we have already expressed our entire concurrence.* We do not much fear that any great practical inconvenience would arise, in the first instance, from the action of the proposed Committee of Council, but we fully agree with Lord Chief Justice Cockburn that it is not expedient to vest such extensive powers over the judicature of the country in the Executive Government of the day. We confess we do not see what business the Chancellor of the Exchequer has with the matter, or why, "even if expense were any object" in such a case, that might not very well be left to the controlling power of Parliament, which could at any time prevent any extravagance. Another and smaller instance of the same tendency, to which the letter in question takes just exception, is the provision vesting the whole of the patronage of the Court (except as to certain officers who are not to be treated as part of the permanent civil service) in the Lord Chancellor; and we think that it would be much better to vest the patronage of each divisional court in the President of that court, retaining of course for the Lord Chancellor the patronage of the High Court itself, as distinguished from all the divisions.

His Lordship's objections to the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill are simpler and more easily disposed of. He shows it is true but a very imperfect knowledge of the defects of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and seems willing to allow to the constitution of that Court much more merit than we should be disposed to accede to, but on the whole he seems fairly alive to the pressing need of a new and efficient court of general appeal. The objections to the proposed appeal committee of the House of Lords need not be discussed, as the proposal was received with so much disfavour by that House that it has been formally withdrawn. The next objection is that the Lords Presidents of the Divisional Courts do not form part of the Court of Appeal. Our objection would rather be to the appearance of two of these Presidents (the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chief Justice) there, because it seems to us that the Court of Appeal ought itself to be a division or divisions, distinct from all the others. It might, indeed, have been deemed advisable to appoint the existing chiefs to the Court of Appeal, had it not unfortunately been thought fit to perpetuate the "Master of the Rolls' anomaly," and give the Lords Presidents of Divisions higher judicial rank and larger salaries than are awarded to the ordinary Judges of Appeal. The continuance of this anomaly effectually prevents any truly logical scheme from being worked out. The next objection taken is to the "Selected Judges." This is a very difficourt question, the object being on the one hand to preserve the Court of Appeal from stagnation, and on the other not to put into the hands of the Government a powerful instrument for undermining the independence of the judges. We are not quite satisfied with the proposal in the bill (which, however, only followed that in the report of the Commission), but we certainly prefer it to that of the Lord Chief Justice, who proposes a Court to consist of five ex officio members (the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and the three Common Law Chiefs), who are all, we presume, to exercise their present functions as well, and six permanent members, "three to be taken from the equity and three from the common law branch of the profession," a distinction which it is the very object of this bill to abolish at once and for ever.

We should, for ourselves, have preferred a somewhat closer adherence to the scheme of the commissioners, and the creation of one or more appellate chambers in the High Court; but we are too anxious for the immediate appearance of a really good Court of Appeal not to be willing to overlook any minor objections for the sake of getting so large a benefit as that offered by the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill without any avoidable delay.

THE PUBLIC PROSECUTORS BILL.

This Bill, which we noticed shortly after its introduction (ante p. 388), has since been read a second time, and has been referred to a select committee. The Attorney-General announced on the part of the Government his general approval of the measure, though without committing himself to approval of details. We see no reason why the select committee should not report the bill in time for it to be passed this session; but even if they should not do so there can be little doubt but that the bill will be passed in some form or other next session, if not this. In the present stage of the question it is perhaps unnecessary for us to repeat the approval which we have several times expressed of some system of public prosecutions, in place of the present want of system. The details of the scheme, however, which yet remain to be settled, are of considerable importance to the public, and also of individual interest to members of the legal profession.

In Scotland there have long been public prosecutors, and the system has on the whole worked well, though not without complaints being made upon it, as appears by the motion made by Sir D. Wedderburn in the House of Commons on Tuesday last. In the English bill it is not proposed to introduce the Scotch system in its entirety, the more objectionable parts, such as the private preliminary investigation before the Procurator Fiscal, being omitted. The general nature of the scheme is that districts are to be created, within each of which there is to be a public prosecutor, who is to be an attorney of ten years' standing. Circuit counsel, barristers of ten years' standing, one to each circuit, are also to be appointed to advise with the public prosecutors. As to the circuit counsel the scheme seems well devised and complete. Preliminary advice in the conduct of a prosecution is often required, and under the present system, owing to the cost being thrown on private parties, is seldom obtained, and doubtless prosecutions often fail for want of proper opinions on evidence. Besides this, in the difficult matter of deciding whether to commence or withdraw from prosecutions the public prosecutors will of course stand in need of occasional, if not frequent, advice, and this is provided by the appointment of the circuit counsel. The circuit counsel are not to be prosecuting counsel, but merely advising counsel, and their disinterestedness is secured by the provision that they shall not advise (we presume this means except in their capacity of circuit counsel) or be concerned in any criminal prosecution within the circuit for which they are appointed. It is to some extent novel to find that the appointments are proposed to be restricted to barristers of ten years' standing, it being usually supposed, on the authority of numerous statutes applicable to particular cases, that a barrister of seven years' standing is competent to fill any post. He is competent as recorder to try them, though he is not to be competent to advise on their prosecution. Such restrictions usually are not of much practical importance, but as to this particular instance it is clearly a case where ability would not supply the place of experience, and therefore it is right that the limit should be higher than for some other offices.

The office of public prosecutors proposed to be created will be an onerous and responsible one, and is certainly an important addition to the small number of public offices at present open to attorneys. The work to be done may shortly be described as that of prosecuting attorney in indictable offences, with important discretionary powers of undertaking or withdrawing from prosecutions. At present most attorneys do not care much to undertake prosecutions. In the majority of cases, the work has to be done for such remuneration as can be recovered from the county, and the amount in each case is usually so small that the work can only be made remunerative where one attorney obtains the conduct of a considerable number of cases. And where the nominal prosecutor employs and pays his own attorney, it is so unpleasant for the latter to have to make out against his client who has only been performing a public duty a heavy bill for expenses over and above those allowed, that as often as not the work is imperfectly, because too cheaply, done.

The result of all this is the system prevailing in so many places, and to which so much objection has been taken—viz., the prosecutions by clerks to committing magistrates. Under the bill as drawn the public prosecutor is to have a salary and also an allowance for offices and clerks. He is to be entitled to the expenses of himself, or his agent, or deputy, and of his witnesses (except compensation to himself, his deputies, or agents for loss of time), in the same manner and under the same rules as other prosecutors. Besides this, by another section of the bill, it is provided that where it is certified by the public prosecutor and by the clerk of the court that the expenses allowable to witnesses are not sufficient to meet their actual and proper expenses, the additional amount shall be allowed and paid. This is, no doubt, intended to prevent the public prosecutor being out of pocket by his prosecutions, and I may probably do so in cases brought to trial. There is, however, no provision made for expenses of cases investigated but afterwards dropped, and these will have to be covered by the public prosecutor's salary. That is scarcely satisfactory, as it gives a direct inducement to the public prosecutor to bring to trial any case which he has incurred expense in investigating. The public prosecutor is not either by himself or his partner, to act as clerk of the peace or clerk to justices, nor to be concerned otherwise than as public prosecutor in any criminal prosecution in his district, but he is not required to give up his other practice.

The districts are to be named by the Secretary of State, and may comprise a whole county or only a petty sessional division. Boroughs having separate quarter sessions may either be districts by themselves or may be included as one district with the division of the county within which they are situate. One important question arises as to who is to appoint the public prosecutor. As the bill is drawn at present the appointment is to be by a Secretary of State who "may" have regard to the recommendation, if any, of the council of the borough or the magistrates of the division for which the appointment is to be made. Probably, what is meant is that the Secretary of State "shall" follow the recommendation of the local authorities in ordinary cases, but shall have power to disregard it if, for good reason, he think fit. Perhaps this would be as good a system as any other, but if this is meant it should be a little differently expressed.

There is one somewhat important matter which the bill does not deal with, and that is the liability of the public prosecutor to an action for malicious prosecution. We apprehend that, even if liable to an action, there would be few cases in which the public prosecutors, if the appointments are properly made, would fail to show reasonable and probable cause. Still, it would make a material difference to the holders of the office whether or not they were liable to be harassed by actions by anyone who was discontented with their conduct. In Scotland we believe that, though the Lord Advocate is not liable to any action, yet a procurator fiscal is so. It is somewhat difficult to say what our Courts would hold to be the position of the public prosecutor in this respect if the bill passed in its present shape, and we think it desirable that the case should be provided for in some way or another, in order that candidates for the office may know exactly what liability they undertake. If they are to be liable for damages where they undertake a prosecution maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause, which probably they ought to be, they ought in cases where they successfully defend such actions, and show that they have been properly performing their public duty, to be entitled to some better remedy for their costs than that which a defendant in such cases usually has, and to be repaid them as part of the expenses of their office in case the plaintiff is insolvent.

BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETIES.

NO. II.

The next points for discussion are, the terms on which a member can obtain an advance from a building society and the conditions on which the advance may be paid off and the security redeemed. It is upon the last of these two points that the greatest amount of litigation has taken place.

In the first place a borrower from a building society pays a high rate of interest. The advantages which he has consist (1) in his being able to pay off the mortgage debt and interest by small instalments; (2) in the mortgage to the society being exempted from stamp duty; (3) in an endorsement of a receipt for the mortgage debt upon the mortgage deed operating as a reconveyance; (4) in the law expenses attendant upon the advance being supposed to be less than they would be in ordinary mortgage transactions; (5) in the fact that building societies are supposed to make advances approximating more nearly to the market value of the property than ordinary lenders would do. The existence of the last two advantages is extremely questionable.

In the second place a borrower from a building society must furnish security. The security may consist of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property, either already belonging to the borrower or purchased with the money advanced; in which last case the purchase is usually made by the society on behalf of the borrower, and the costs of the society arising out of the purchase are charged to the borrower. In all cases the society will require evidence of the value of the property offered as security, and the cost of procuring this evidence falls upon the borrower. Besides this, many societies charge a small commission on advances.

In the third place the borrower must be a member of the society, and he must hold shares the nominal amount of which is equal to the amount of the advance. Thus, if the shares are £50 each a borrowing member must hold ten unadvanced shares to get an advance of £500. In theory, what the borrowing member obtains is the full amount of his shares by anticipation. But in fact he obtains an advance out of the funds of the society, which he repays with interest by monthly instalments. There is this difference between a permanent and a terminating society, that in the former the borrowing member gets the full amount of his shares advanced to him less in some cases a small commission; whereas in the latter he does not always get the full amount, for there are three ways in which advances are made—by rotation, by ballot, or by bidding; i.e., when there are sufficient funds in hand to make an advance that advance may be made either to the senior member desiring it or to a member selected by ballot, or, which is the usual way, the members bid against each other the discount they are willing to allow on the amount of the advance to them; thus, if there are two members, each having two £50 shares, and one bids thirty-five per cent. discount and the other forty per cent., the latter will get the advance, but then he will only receive £60 in full satisfaction of his shares, and he will still have to pay the subscriptions on two shares. The effect of course is that under these circumstances a borrowing member borrows on very disadvantageous terms.

A borrowing member or mortgagor, then, who has received an advance, has to make certain monthly payments, which are partly subscriptions on the shares held by him and partly interest on the advance. If these monthly sums are not paid at the proper time fines are exacted, which fines, although seemingly small in amount, are often in reality imposed at an exorbitant rate. Sixpence per share per month is a usual amount, and sometimes this is doubled. It is not to be wondered at, then, that the question whether such fines or penalties are "reasonable" within the meaning of the first section of the Building Societies Act was raised for the decision of the Court of Chancery. This was done in Parker v. Butcher (L. R. 3 Eq. 762, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 22). There the fines were at the rate of one shilling per pound per month—i.e., sixty per cent. per annum; and it was alleged that they were unreasonable, and further that being in the nature of a forfeiture they were illegal. Lord Romilly held that they were not unreasonable, and that there was nothing of the nature of a forfeiture in the transaction. He said, "It is a matter well understood between the parties, and it is a contract which, in the absence of all fraud or undue pressure, the parties were perfectly competent to enter into."

It is noticeable that a mortgage to a building society does not in all respects resemble in form an ordinary mortgage. The recitals generally state that the borrowing member or mortgagor is entitled to so many shares in the society, and that he has become entitled to an advance of a certain lump sum, and that the same is to be in full satisfaction and discharge of his shares. The covenant for payment is not for payment of the lump sum and interest, but for payment of the monthly or other contributions or sums of money which by the rules for the time being of the society shall become due and payable by the mortgagor. The proviso for redemption declares, not that the borrowing member or mortgagor is entitled to redeem on payment of the lump sum advanced to him and interest but that if he pays the said monthly or other contributions or sums of money, and observes the rules of the society, then the mortgagees shall endorse on the mortgage deed a receipt for all moneys intended to be thereby secured. It is extremely necessary that there should be in the rules of every society one or more setting out exactly the terms upon which a borrowing member or mortgagor is to be entitled to redeem his property, and that the proviso for redemption in mortgages to the society should refer to or incorporate, or at any rate correspond exactly with, such rule or rules. If, therefore, the borrowing member or mortgagor pays his monthly or other contributions and fines, if any, he will at the expiration of a certain period have redeemed his property, and when the receipt is endorsed on the mortgage deed his property will be vested in him discharged from the mortgage debt. Of course, if the borrowing member or mortgagor makes default in his payments the society can sell the mortgaged property. The proceeds of the sale are applied in paying to the society all moneys then due, and also the present value of all the future monthly or other contributions which the borrowing member or mortgagor has covenanted to pay, and the surplus, if any, goes to the borrowing member or mortgagor. In calculating the present value of the future payments the rules of most societies allow a discount. But whether any discount is allowed or not, and what is the amount of such discount (if any), are questions of construction of the rules of each society. In the case of Matterson v. Elderfield (17 W. R. 422, L. R. 4 Ch. 207), it was argued that as the future contributions are composed partly of interest, the society, as mortgagees, could not retain interest that had never accrued, therefore they must allow a rebate or discount even if it were not expressly provided for by the rules. The Lord Chancellor held that it depended entirely upon the construction of the rules whether discount or rebate was allowed or not, and as there was no rule in that case entitling the mortgagor to discount or rebate, when the society exercised the power of sale, he held, reversing the decision of Lord Justice Giffard, then Vice-Chancellor, that no discount or rebate was claimable.

Next, it must be noticed that the society cannot call in the money they have advanced on mortgage to the borrowing member, or mortgagor; but the borrowing member, or mortgagor, can redeem at any time by prepayment of what is due under the mortgage deed by him to the society—i.e., the arrears of the contributions and fines (if any), and also the present value of the future contributions which would thereafter become payable under the mortgage deed. In many societies a premium is offered for paying off or redeeming mortgages by a discount or rebate being allowed upon the present value of such future contributions. In calculating the amount which a borrowing member or mortgagee has to pay to redeem his property, he is entitled to be credited with the amount of the bonus or share of the profits (if any) which the rules of the society give to every member withdrawing from the society; because, in redeeming his property, the borrowing member or mortgagor does, in effect, withdraw from the society, and his shares are extinguished. This point was involved in the decision of Lord Cranworth in Fleming v. Self (3 De G. M. & G. 997). Where the society is a permanent society no question can arise as to the amount of the future contributions to which the borrowing member or mortgagee would become liable unless he redeemed his property; but in the case of a terminating society, there was some question as to how this was to be calculated until the decision in Fleming v. Self, which established the rule that the longest period during which the society might probably last must be ascertained, and the amount of the contributions which would become due and payable by the borrowing member or mortgagor in case the society endured for the whole of that period is the amount which the borrowing member or mortgagor must pay as future contributions in order to redeem.

Here it may be noticed that the Act of Geo. 4 renders it imperative that provision shall be made by the rules of a society for the reference of all disputes between the society and any member, or person claiming on account of any member, either to justices of the peace or to arbitrators, the method of appointing whom is prescribed by the 27th section of the Act. The award of the arbitrators, or a majority of them, when confirmed by a justice of the peace, is final, and a justice of the peace may enforce compliance with the award in the manner prescribed in the Act. It must be observed that the dispute must be between the society and a member in his capacity of member, and not in any other capacity, such as mortgagor (Farmer v. Giles, 5 H. & N. 785). But where the dispute is between the society and a member qua-member, the Act of Parliament ousts the jurisdiction of the courts of law and equity; nor can an award made be set aside unless there is an error on the face of it, or it has been corruptly obtained. The present Lord Chancellor observed, in Armitage v. Walker (3 K. & J. 219), "The Legislature intended carefully to provide that these societies should not be dragged before courts of law or equity if it could possibly be avoided, and has taken care to enact that the whole discussion of their affairs shall be disposed of in a cheap and summary manner by the decision of an arbitrator or justice, as the parties shall choose, and when they have once made their election, the power of the justice or of the arbitrator, acting always within the rules of the society, is complete, and is not subject to revision by any court of law or equity. That is the primary matter to which attention must be drawn, and it is necessary to be extremely careful that the jurisdiction of this Court shall not be set up to control the arbitrators so selected except upon a very clear and distinct case being made out of their abuse of office."

Any treatment of the subject of Building Societies would be incomplete without an allusion to the question whether it is ultra vires or not for a building society to borrow money. As we have dealt with this subject so recently (ante, pp. 388, 407), we need do little more than refer our readers to our previous remarks. There are two appellate cases on the subject. The one, Laing v. Reed (18 W. R. 76, L. R. 5 Ch. 4), the other Re National Permanent Building Society (18 W. R. 388). In the first it was ruled by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice Giffard that a rule giving a limited borrowing power is not ultra vires among the rules of a Benefit Building Society. In the second Lord Justice Giffard held that when there is no rule authorising the borrowing of money, a society cannot borrow so as to bind itself or the individual members thereof, qua members. Whether this ruling is correct to the broad extent to which it seems to go is rather doubtful, but that it is right so far as it holds that building societies cannot carry on a banking business, is unquestionable. This case was followed by Vice-Chancellor Malins in Re The Victoria Permanent Building, Investment, and Freehold Land Society of Birmingham, decided by him on the 7th of March last.

RECENT DECISIONS.

PRIVY COUNCIL.

PRACTICE OF JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL —APPEAL AGAINST JUDGMENT FOR DEFENDANT
WHERE APPELLANT HAS ONLY A RIGHT TO NOMINAL DAMAGES.

Giraud v. Paterson, P. C. 18 W. R. 359.

The only portion of this case that requires notice is the decision that in a suit where damages alone are to be recovered, if there is "a nominal interest which might be the subject of some action in some of the courts of common law, that species of nominal interest for the mere nominal claim for damages would be no ground before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to recommend that the judgment of the Court below should be reversed and the appellant held entitled to their Lordships' judgment." The facts of the case raised this question, and the appeal was dismissed.

The object of this rule is, of course, to discourage fruitless litigation. It can be of but little practical importance (except on the question of costs, which, in such cases, it would be better for all parties not to incur) whether the judgment is for the defendant or for the plaintiff for nominal damages in a suit where damages alone are the object of the proceedings. The rule, it will be observed, does not apply to a case where a question of right, apart from the mere recovery of damages, is involved.

EQUITY.

CONDITIONAL APPLICATION FOR SHARES.

Bridger's case, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 412.

This was not the case of an agreement to take shares on a condition which the company have become unable to fulfil, so that the contract is at an end, but of an agreement to take shares simpliciter, with a collateral agreement that the shares should be paid for in a particular way—viz., out of the commission which would be payable to the applicant as an agent for the company. There is a broad distinction between the effect of an application for shares with a distinct purpose avowed and made the condition, and an application for shares with a purpose which though communicated to the company, is not made the condition precedent to the allotment being accepted by the applicant. In Fletcher's case (16 W. R. 75), the applicant's object was to qualify for the direction, and in Elkington's case (16 W. R. 726) to supply the hotel with electro-plated articles. In both these cases, as in Bridger's case, the allotment was unconditional with a bargain superadded to it, and on the commencement of the winding up these gentlemen were rightly settled on the list of contributories as unconditional allottees, notwithstanding the attainment of their respective objects had become impossible by the stoppage of the companies. On the other hand, when the application is expressly on a condition, communicated to the company at the time of the application, though not necessarily on the same piece of paper with it (Rogers' case, 16 W. R. 881), then, unless the conditions be performed before the commencement of the winding up, there will be no completed contract. Instances of this are Rogers' case (ubi sup.), where the condition was that the applicant should be appointed manager of the branch bank, and Simpson's case (17 W. R. 424), that the applicant should have the contract for the repairs of the company's hotel. In Pellatt's case (15 W. R. 726), the application was upon an express condition, and was answered by an allotment simpliciter, and Pellatt never having waived the condition, it was held that the company had attempted to introduce a new term into the contract, and that not having been acceded to by Pellatt, there was no completed contract under which he could be held liable to take the shares. Bridger, on the other hand, agreed to take shares simpliciter, there were the three ingredients in his case mentioned in Fletcher's case as essential to make a member of a company—viz., application, allotment, and communication of and acquiescence in the allotment, and the status thus gained could not be affected by the collateral agreement that the shares were to be paid for in a particular way, although performance of that agreement was no longer possible.

VOLUNTARY SETTLEMENT—SUBSEQUENT CREDITOR— 13 ELIZ. C. 5.

Freeman v. Pope, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 399, L. R. 9 Eq. 206.

Under statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, where a voluntary settlement is impeached by a creditor of the settlor, it might have been supposed that the only question ought to be whether, taking the whole transaction together, the intention of the settlement was to defeat the persons who were at the time creditors of the settlor (Holmes v. Penney, 5 W. R. 132); the Courts, however, have been prone to look at the sequel, and to infer the intention, where the effect is to delay the creditor (Richardson v. Smallwood, Jac. 152), instead of confining their attention to the evidence as regards the state of affairs at and about the making of the deed and inferring the intention therefrom. In the present state of the authorities, we regard the remarks of the Vice-Chancellor on this subject in Freeman v. Pope, if we may respectfully say so, as most opportune.

The suit to set aside a voluntary settlement may be brought either by a prior or a subsequent creditor. For a prior creditor to succeed, all that he need do is to show that he is delayed in the payment of his debt by the existence of the settlement. A subsequent creditor, whose debt had not been contracted at the date of the settlement "must show, either that the settlor made the settlement with express intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors, or that after the settlement the settlor had no sufficient means or reasonable expectation of being able to pay his then existing debts, that is to say, was reduced to a state of insolvency" (Spirett v. Willons, 18 W. R. 129, 3 D. J. S. 293). So long, however, as there is an unpaid creditor prior to the deed, any subsequent creditor may file a bill and obtain a decree to set aside the deed upon the footing of the prior creditor's debt existing, exactly as the prior creditor himself might if the bill were filed by him (Jenkyn v. Vaughan, 3 Dr. 419). If, therefore, at the time of executing a voluntary settlement, the settlor is indebted, and in the result any prior creditor is delayed in the payment of his debt, then, however solvent the settlor may have been at the time, the deed may be set aside either at the suit of the prior creditor, or, so long as any prior debt is not paid, of any subsequent creditor. The Vice-Chancellor came to this conclusion in Freeman v. Pope, in obedience to, though without approving of, the decision in Spirett v. Willons, which expressly determines that where the debt existed at the date of the settlement, and the creditor's remedy is delayed by the existence of the settlement, it is immaterial whether the debtor was or was not solvent after making the settlement. Lord Westbury followed the decision in Townsend v. Westacott (2 Beav. 340), that there is no need to show insolvency on the part of the settlor at the date of the settlement. Yet a man may be kept indebted in spite of himself by a withholding of claims, and although in such a case it is probable that no Court would assume an intention to delay the creditors, yet, according to Spirett v. Willons, if a man has at any time afterwards become insolvent, it is no defence that immediately after making the settlement he continued perfectly solvent.

DOMICIL OF DEBTOR—PROBATE IN INDIA AND IN ENGLAND.

Fernandes' case, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 411.

Mr. Fernandes was domiciled at Bombay, and was a simple contract creditor of the Commercial Bank Corporation, an English company, which was being wound up in the chambers of the Master of the Rolls. After receiving one dividend on his claim, Mr. Fernandes died, and his executors, after proving his will in India, applied to the official liquidator, by their attorney in England, for payment of the second dividend. The official liquidator declined to pay it without the sanction of the Court, on the ground that there ought to be an English probate of the will. The Master of the Rolls directed the liquidator to remit the dividend to Bombay, at the expense of the executors, without requiring probate to be taken out in England, on the ground, apparently, that the company was essentially an Indian establishment, though winding-up in England (18 W. R. 202). The Lord Justice held that an English probate ought to be produced before the dividend could be paid. The case seems to be one of importance, and perhaps of some hardship to the creditor. There were, however, two reasons why there ought to be an English probate in this case. The first was, that the debt was bonum notabile in England, inasmuch as England was the domicile of the company at the time of Mr. Fernandes' death: Attorney-General v. Bowen, 4 M. & W. 191, and secondly, that the money was in the hands of the liquidator who, as the officer of the Court, could only pay it out upon the production of such evidence of title as the Court itself would require, such evidence being the English probate. It is the domicile of the debtor, not that of the creditor, which is material in these cases. Conversely, had the company been an Indian company, and the creditor domiciled in England, his executors could only have got at the money upon proving the will in India.

COMMON LAW.

INTERROGATORIES—PLAINTIFF'S TITLE—PRACTICE.

The Derby Commercial Bank (Limited) v. Lumsden and Another, C.P., 18 W. R. 526.

This case illustrates a rule of practice that is often acted on, but often misunderstood. Generally a defendant is not allowed to interrogate the plaintiff as to the plaintiff's title in the action. It is for the plaintiff to establish this, and if he fails to do so he fails in his action. The defendant must rely on his some substantive defence of his own, and not seek to build one up from materials gathered from information obtained from the plaintiff. If, however, the defendant admits a prima facie title in the plaintiff, but seeks to avoid the effect of that title by showing additional facts which destroy it, interrogatories may be administered by the defendant for the purpose of ascertaining the precise nature of such facts. Such facts, it is clear, are the defendant's evidence and not the plaintiff's. The plaintiff would not, of course, produce them at the trial; but the defendant would be compelled to do so, to avoid the effect of the prima facie title. This practice forms an apparent rather than a real exception to the rule which forbids a defendant to interrogate the plaintiff as to the plaintiff's title.

Finney v. Farnard (14 W. R. 85) is an illustration of the general rule protecting plaintiffs from the necessity of giving discovery of title to defendants; and The Derby, &c., Bank v. Lumsden, illustrates the apparent exception. In The Derby, &c., Bank v. Lumsden, the plaintiffs, as holders of bills of lading, sued the defendants. The defendants admitted the plaintiffs' title prima facie as holders of the bills of lading, but set up as a defence certain facts connected with the delivery of the bills to the plaintiffs which, as the defendants contended, showed a defence to the action. The defendants were allowed to administer the interrogatories as to these facts on the ground that, in so doing, they only sought discovery of their own case, and did not inquire into that of the plaintiffs.

In cases such as these a special affidavit, setting out the facts of the case, should be made, so as to show how it is that the applicants are entitled to the order for which they ask, and this was done in this case.

It is as well to notice that what we have said does not apply to actions of ejectment. They are governed by a practice somewhat different from that of other actions. In ejectment the defendant is not, as a general rule, entitled to interrogate the plaintiff as to his title (Stoate v. Reid, 11 W. R. 595; Pearson v. Turner, 12 W. R. 801; Provident Assurance Company v. MacInerheny, 18 W. R. 583). But, under special circumstances, such interrogatories may be allowed (Fletcher v. Fletcher, 4 W. R. 268; and Kettlewell v. Dyson, 16 W. R. 851).

MARINE INSURANCE—COMMENCEMENT OF INSURABLE INTEREST.

Foley v. The United Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Sydney, Ex. Ch., 18 W. R. 437.

We noticed a short time ago (ante, p. 314), amongst the "Recent Decisions," the case of Barber v. Fleming (18 W. R. 254), where it was held that if a vessel is chartered from A. to B, the interest in the freight commences under the charter-party on the vessel sailing for A. in ballast, and consequently the shipowner has an insurable interest in such freight as soon as the voyage to A. commences. This decision recognises the rule to this effect laid down in Phillips on Insurance, s. 828.

In Barber v. Fleming the vessel sailed in ballast to a port under a charter-party, under which she was to take a cargo from that port to her port of destination. The freight under the charter-party was insured and the vessel lost before she reached her port of loading. In deciding that the shipowner had an insurable interest in the freight, the Court said that they did not decide what would have been the result if the vessel had sailed with a cargo to her port of loading, or if she had made any intermediate voyages before going to the port of loading, which was permitted by the terms of the charter-party.

Foley v. The United &c. Insurance Company has now decided that if in the case we first put a vessel is chartered from A. to B, the insurable interest in the freight commences under the charter-party on the vessel sailing for A. even with a cargo, if the voyage to A. is with the object of carrying out the terms of the charter-party as well as of conveying cargo. The principle of the decision is that "an inchoate right to the freight attached as soon as the voyage agreed on by the charter-party was commenced and in which ultimately the freight was to be earned." The facts in Foley v. The United &c. Insurance Company were shortly that a vessel then about to sail with a cargo from Calcutta to Mauritius was chartered to sail with all convenient speed to Mauritius to discharge her cargo there and then to sail to Rice Ports and there to load. The freight under the charter-party was insured "at and from" Mauritius to Rice Ports. The vessel was lost at Mauritius by a peril insured against when about half the cargo had been discharged. It was argued that the insurance did not attach until the vessel had discharged her cargo and so was ready to sail under the charter-party. A distinction was drawn in argument between this case and Barber v. Fleming on the ground that in this case the vessel should have gone with her cargo to Mauritius even if not chartered by the insured, and that such voyage was, therefore, not an inception of the voyage the freight for which was insured. It was decided, however, on the principle before mentioned that the interest had already commenced before the loss and that the liability under the assurance attached as soon as the vessel arrived at Mauritius.

The result of Foley v. The United, &c., Insurance Company is that it includes and extends the principle of Barber v. Fleming, but it still leaves open the question whether if in a case like Barber v. Fleming the vessel had been lost on an intermediate voyage allowed by the charter-party, the shipowner could recover for the loss of his insured freight. This point was not touched upon in Foley v. The United, &c., Insurance Company.

REVIEWS.

A Practical Treatise on the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, together with so much of the Debtors Act, 1869, and the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act, 1869, as Relates to Bankruptcy; with the Statutes, General Rules, Orders Relating to County Courts and District Bankruptcy Courts, Notes of Cases under the Old and New Law, Scales of Costs and Fees, and a Copious Index. By JOHN T. TREHERNE, Solicitor, a Member of the Incorporated Law Society. London: Shaw & Sons. 1870.

This appears to us to be one of the most complete and serviceable of the many manuals relating to the new law of bankruptcy which have come under our notice. As we have more than once said, the time has hardly yet arrived when a really systematic and exhaustive work on the new law and practice of bankruptcy can be looked for; the law is still to a great extent doubtful, and the practice unsettled. But Mr. Treherne, in his notes to the new Act, has brought together a large mass of law, both old and new, which will be of great assistance in understanding and working the Act; and the book is well-arranged and well-indexed.

The Law relating to Industrial and Provident Societies (including the winding up clauses), with a practical introduction, notes, and model rules; to which are added the Law of France on the same subject, and remarks on Trade Unions. By EDWARD WILLIAM BRABROOK, F.S.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, and of the Friendly Societies Registry. London: Butterworth's.

Mr. Brabrook, taking a strong personal interest in this subject, and aided by his position as an employé of the Registry of Friendly Societies, has compiled an account of Industrial and Provident Societies, and some other matters ejusdem generis, which is likely to be very serviceable to people desirous of understanding the rationale and history of these societies.

The work is addressed rather to persons interested practically in the subject than to lawyers, though, as suggestively, carefully and accurately written, it may be usefully consulted by practitioners desirous of learning more upon the subject than is to be found in works on partnerships or joint stock companies. An introduction of thirty-five pages gives a succinct history of the legislation on the subject, statistics, and some good practical advice. The Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1862, is then printed, with forms and a few notes of decided cases, &c., and there are also given the relevant portions of the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1862, with a few more notes. A form of model rules is then given, of the merits of which we do not profess to be judges, and parts V. and VI. are taken up by the French law of 24th June, 1867, relating to Co-operative Societies, and some account of the history of the law relative to Trades Unions, and the recent legislation and proposals for legislation on that subject. There is also a full and carefully ordered index. A short table is given of thirty-five reported decisions cited in the course of the work.

It is needless for us to say that this by no means exhausts the authorities material to the practitioner upon the subject dealt with by Mr. Brabrook; the book, however, is thoughtfully written, and we recommend it to those who desire to learn something practical about the work which these societies are meant to do and the way in which it is to be done.

▲ Treatise on the Law and Practice Respecting Bills of Sale; with the Registration Act. By JAMES P. BYRNE, Esq., Solicitor. Second Edition. London: Stevens & Haynes. Dublin: Hodges & Smith.

This treatise appears to be the work of a solicitor practising in Dublin; and it is no doubt intended primarily for use in Ireland. But the law of bills of sale is in almost all particulars the same in the two countries; the most material difference is the somewhat arbitrary and unaccountable one that, whereas, by the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 96, bills of sale in England require re-registration every five years, there is no corresponding provision for Ireland. Mr. Byrne's book is, therefore, really almost as well adapted for use in England as in Ireland. It appears to us to contain a very careful and accurate summary of the branch of law with which it deals, and a very complete collection of the cases upon the subject, including the most modern.

COURTS.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(In Banco, before BLACKBURN, MELLOR, and HANSEN, JJ.)

April 28. — In the matter of Frederick Augustus Farrar, an attorney.

In this case a rule had been obtained calling on the Incorporated Law Society to show cause why Mr. Farrar should not be restored to the roll of attorneys. Murray appeared to show cause against the rule on behalf of the society; Prentice in support of its being made absolute.

It may be remembered that Mr. Farrar was convicted at the October sessions, 1868, of the Central Criminal Court for uttering a forged acceptance of Earl Dudley for £800, and was thereupon sentenced by Mr. Justice Byles to ten years' penal servitude. It was then a matter of course that he should be struck off the roll of attorneys. In the January succeeding, however, after an investigation, the Home Office came to the conclusion that the prisoner had been wrongly convicted. Thereupon he received a free pardon, and subsequently an application was made to have him restored to the roll of attorneys. The Law Society, however, refused to do so, upon the ground that the circumstances were such as to justify the conclusion that Mr. Farrar was not a proper person to be allowed to practise as an attorney. Upon appeal to this Court, their lordships desired further information, to assure them that the pardon of the Home Office was founded upon the conviction of Mr. Farrar's innocence, or that it resulted from some irregularity at the trial, or from Mr. Farrar having given evidence against the other prisoner, Hullet. However, from the affidavits now produced, it was made clear that the pardon was due to the belief in Mr. Farrar's innocence of the charge. It appeared that Hullet was a bill discounter of some notoriety residing in Hampshire, and living there under circumstances of a certain degree of affluence. Farrar became acquainted with him in May, 1868, and shortly after he wrote to Farrar proposing that Farrar should borrow money from his clients to advance to needy turfites and spendthrift young gentlemen through Hullet. For this the clients were to receive ten per cent., Farrar ten per cent. commission, and Hullet ten per cent. commission. There was no evidence, however, that Farrar had assented to the proposal. Hullet was also known in the musical world, and in July, 1868, he sent up to Farrar an agreement purporting to be drawn up between himself and Earl Dudley, whereby, in consideration of a payment of 800 guineas, he was to write an opera for his Lordship. Simultaneously he sent up the forged acceptance per post for Farrar to negotiate. Farrar seems to have had no difficulty in negotiating what purported to be Lord Dudley's acceptance for £800, but of course the fraud very quickly came to light. Farrar appeared as a witness against Hullet, and thereupon Mrs. Hullet turned round and gave up a number of letters on which the prosecution against Farrar was founded. Among the memorialists to the Home Office in Farrar's favour were the Messrs. Lewis, the attorneys for the prosecution, who declared that in their opinion the verdict of the jury was not justifiable.

BLACKBURN, J., said he had come to the conclusion that the decision of the Home Office was well founded, and that the grant of a pardon was ex debito justitiæ. Further, he did not think that the circumstances disclosed would warrant their striking an attorney off the rolls. At the same time a distinction was to be made between striking an attorney off the rolls and keeping him off once he had been struck off. Had Mr. Farrar accepted the offer of the ten per cent. commission, they might have come to the conclusion that the rule ought to be discharged. But as there was no evidence that he had, the rule would be made absolute for restoring him to the rolls. Mr. Farrar, in aiding and abetting the advance of money to young spendthrifts, had unfortunately touched pitch, and might be proportionately blackened. It had, moreover, been established against him that he had acted as an attorney for a year without a stamped certificate. No doubt this was through inadvertence; still, in addition to the proper stamp duty to be recouped to the department, he must pay a penalty of £10.

A rule absolute was accordingly made.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

(In Banco, before BOVILL, C.J., and KEATING, SMITH, and BRETT, JJ.)

May 6. — Sinclair v. The Great Eastern Railway Company.

In this action the plaintiff's claim had been referred to arbitration and fixed by the arbitrator at £28,000, and a rule nisi to set aside the award having been granted on the terms of paying into court the debt and costs, to abide the event, the defendants had paid into court the sum of £28,850 as security for debt and costs, pending the argument on the rule. On the 8th of November last the rule was discharged, the clerk of the plaintiff's attorneys being present at the time. On the 2nd of December the defendants' attorney informed the plaintiff's attorney that the money lay in court at their risk. At this time judgment had been signed, but there appeared to have been some dispute, in the course of which the defendants' attorney said that no interest would be paid on the amount of the debt and costs after the discharge of the rule. The plaintiff's attorneys contended, on the other hand, that it was for the defendants to bring the money and not for the plaintiff to go and take it. They therefore refused to take it out of court, and threatened an execution. After it had remained in court for three months from the discharge of the rule, the defendants' attorney took it out to save the interest, and the plaintiff's attorneys took proceedings to obtain execution for the amount of the award, the costs, and interest not only from the date of the award, but also since the 9th of November, at 4 per cent. A rule having been obtained to stay these proceedings,

Sir G. Honyman and Watkin Williams shewed cause against the rule, and contended that it was the duty of the defendants' attorney to have paid over the money to the plaintiff's attorneys, and that it was not for the plaintiff's attorneys to go and take the money out of court, nor were they bound to do so.

BOVILL, C.J., said so far as he could make out the matter, it seemed to be a dispute between the attorneys' clerks, who should take out a summons at a cost of 2s., to go before the judge and get an order at a further cost of 2s., to take the money, £28,850, out of court and charge 6s. 8d. for doing it.

Sir J. Karlake, Q.C., and Marriott, for the defendants, cited Hewes v. Pyke, 1 Dowl. 322. The defendants were ready to pay interest on the amount awarded from the signing of the judgment to the 8th November, but they ought not to be liable for any further interest, as on that day the plaintiff might have taken the whole amount out of court.

BOVILL, C.J., said if the question had been whether the judgment was satisfied by the payment of the money into court he should have been of opinion that, according to strict technical rule, it was not. But that was not the question on this rule. The Court had always the power of controlling its proceedings and of taking care that injustice was not done. The question was, whether this money had not been brought into court for the plaintiff, to be received by him if the application to set aside the award was not successful. The plain meaning of that was that if the application failed then the plaintiff should have the money so paid into court, and no judge or counsel or attorney could understand it in a different sense. The rule to set aside the award was refused on the 9th of November, and there was nothing to prevent the plaintiff from obtaining payment of the money paid into court. The money was there, and if, having the means of obtaining that money, the attorney for the plaintiff had thought fit to issue execution, according to Hughes v. Pike the Court would have set aside that execution, and would not have allowed the costs of it, for it would be an abuse of the process of the Court. He really could not conceive what was the real object of this dispute. He could hardly suppose it was a question of two shillings for a summons and two shillings for an order. If the plaintiff's attorneys had thought fit to take out the summons, and had obtained the defendants' consent, and had attended to receive the money, he was informed by the Master that all would have been allowed on taxation of costs. This dispute had arisen, he must suppose, from temper—from one attorney's clerk putting his knowledge of law against another attorney's clerk, the result being that somebody would have lost all the interest for three months on £28,850, and somebody would have lost all the costs of the present rule. It would be sanctioning an abuse of the proceedings of the Court to allow the security to stand as security for the interest which had accrued on the money paid into court after the time when it might have been taken out by the plaintiff. The rule, therefore, must be absolute.

KEATING, SMITH, and BRETT, JJ., concurred.
Attorneys for the plaintiff, Thomas & Hollams.
Attorney for the defendant, Shaw.

(In Banco, before KEATING, SMITH, and BRETT, JJ.)
May 7.—Dickson v. The London and Brighton Railway Company.

The plaintiff in this case had recovered from the defendants £250 for damages, and £93 5s. 4d. for costs, upon the ground that he was injured in the New-cross accident. Subsequently it was found that he was not in the train at all, and that a rupture, which it had been said was caused by the collision, was some years old. Upon these facts the plaintiff was convicted at the Old Bailey of perjury and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. A rule was then obtained to set aside the judgment in the action, and to call upon the plaintiff to show cause why he should not repay the amount received from the company. The rule also called upon Mr. Stephen Scott, the plaintiff's attorney, to show cause why he should not repay to the company as much of the money as he had not paid to the plaintiff.

J. Brown, Q.C. (W. Y. Clare with him), for Mr. Scott, produced affidavits which stated that the £250 (except about £30 for extra costs) had been paid over to the plaintiff or to his order; and the attorney had simply retained the amount of his costs as between attorney and client.

Lopes, Q.C. (Joyce with him), said the question was whether Mr. Scott could, under the circumstances, retain the amount which he had received from the company for costs. They submitted that he could not retain money which he would never have received but for the fraud of the plaintiff.

No cause was shown on behalf of the plaintiff.

KEATING, J., said that there was of course no doubt that the money had been obtained from the defendants by the fraud of the plaintiff, but there was nothing to show that there was any professional or other misconduct on the part of the attorney, and therefore it was not right that he should be made liable to return the money, as though he had been a participator in the fraud. The rule must, therefore, be discharged as against the attorney, and made absolute against the plaintiff.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(In Banco, before KELLY, C.B., and MARTIN, BRAMWELL, and CLEASBY, BB.)

May 6.—Matthews v. Collis and Another.

In this case (vide ante 528) the Court now discharged both rules.

KELLY, C.B., and BRAMWELL, B., however, stated their individual opinions that a less sum for damages would have sufficed.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

May 2.—Re Wyatt.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 19—Public examination of bankrupt—Allegation of fraudulent conduct—Practice.

At this sitting for public examination of the bankrupt, held pursuant to the 19th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, Mr. Boydell, solicitor, for a creditor, proposed to examine the bankrupt for the purpose of showing that he had obtained money by false pretences.

Mr. Lloyd, solicitor, for the trustee appointed under the bankruptcy, did not oppose.

The CHIEF JUDGE said this was not the proper time for the opposing creditor to prefer his complaint. The only question before the Court was whether the bankrupt was entitled to pass his examination upon the accounts which he had filed, and evidence for the purpose of showing that the conduct of the bankrupt was open to objection could not be allowed. The consideration of the bankrupt's conduct would be reserved.

Solicitors for the trustee, Forst & Lloyd.

May 4.—Re Greer.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 84, rule 94—Adjournment of first meeting—Order to annul—Adjudication.

Mr. Munns, solicitor for the bankrupt, asked for an order to annul the adjudication.

It appeared that at the first meeting held under the bankruptcy one creditor only proved his debt, and the proceedings were adjourned for a week, in pursuance of the 84th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and the 94th rule. Before the day appointed for the adjourned sitting, the creditor proving signed a consent to the annulment of the adjudication, but upon an application being made to the registrar for an order he declined to make it by reason of the adjournment of the former meeting, and the matter was referred to the Chief Judge.

Mr. Munns submitted that he was entitled, upon proof of the usual requisites, to an order for the annulment of the adjudication, without waiting for the adjourned meeting of creditors. Under the old law the Court constantly annulled adjudications with the consent of creditors who had proved or claimed debts, and he asked that the practice should be followed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. He submitted that the circumstance of the first meeting of creditors having been adjourned formed no valid reason for a refusal to grant an order to annul.

The CHIEF JUDGE said the words of the statute were very plain. Until the adjourned sitting had taken place the first sitting was not in fact complete, but when that had been held an application might be made for an order to annul. As matters now stood nothing could be clearer; until the second meeting had taken place the bankrupt was not in a position to ask for an order to annul.

Application refused.

Solicitors, Lewis, Munns, Nunn & Longden.

May 6.—Re Hower.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 84, 125, & 126—Petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition—First meeting without a quorum.

Mr. Frankish, solicitor for the debtor, applied for the direction of the Court under the following circumstances:—The debtor, who had only four creditors, filed a petition for liquidation, under the 125th & 126th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. At the first meeting only one creditor attended, and he passed a resolution for a liquidation out of court. The Registrar, upon the matter being brought under his notice, was of opinion that the proceedings fell through, but on the part of the debtor it was now contended that by the effect of the section 125 (division 2), and section 84, and rule 94, the proceedings should stand adjourned for a week in order that a quorum, consisting of three creditors, might have a further opportunity to attend and pass a resolution.

The CHIEF JUDGE, was of opinion that the meeting should be considered as adjourned for a week, in order that a valid resolution might be passed by a quorum of three creditors.

Order accordingly.

May 9.—Re Figuls.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 72, 125, & 126—Jurisdiction—Injunction—Practice.

Reed, on behalf of the mortgagor of the lease of the debtor's premises and other property, applied for an order against the landlord of the premises, restraining him from proceeding further in an action of ejectment which he had brought for recovering possession of the property.

It appeared that the mortgagor had consented that his right to realise his security should remain in abeyance, in order that the receiver appointed under the proceedings should realise the property and pay him out of the proceeds. The present application was made under the 72nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. No adjudication had yet been made.

Reed contended that the Court had jurisdiction to deal with a question of this nature without the presentation of a petition.

The CHIEF JUDGE doubted whether the Court could interfere with the right of the landlord, which was paramount, but at all events it was an essential condition that the applicant should give an undertaking to indemnify the landlord. The subject of indemnity seemed somewhat to have been overlooked in previous cases. The order would be granted upon the condition stated.

Solicitor, Maynard.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. WILLIAM LAMBERT DOBSON, Attorney-General of the colony of Tasmania, has been appointed a Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Hobart Town, in the room of Sir Francis Smith, who has become Chief Justice on the retirement of Sir Valentine Fleming. The new judge is the eldest son of the late Mr. John Dobson, formerly of Carr Hill, Durham, who afterwards settled in Van Diemen's Land. Mr. W. L. Dobson received his early education at Hobart Town, but came to England to prosecute his legal studies; he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1856, having obtained a certificate of honour in the bar examination. On his return to the colony he was appointed Crown Solicitor of Tasmania, but soon resigned that office to become Solicitor-General in succession to the late Mr. T. J. Knight. On the resignation of Mr. Knight in February, 1861, Mr. Dobson was nominated Attorney-General and a member of the Executive Council of that colony, which office he held while his party remained in power. The Attorney-Generalship of colonial governments is generally a stepping-stone to the bench, and Mr. Dobson, like the Chief Justice, Sir Francis Smith, has now become a judge by favour of the Tasmanian ministry.

MR. JAMES COCKBURN PINNIGER, solicitor, of Newbury, has been elected coroner for the eastern division of the county of Berks, in succession to the late Dr. Alexander. The unsuccessful candidate, Mr. W. J. Cowper, had acted as deputy to the late coroner, who was his father-in-law, for seventeen years. Mr. Pinniger was admitted as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term 1855; he is junior partner in the local firm of B. & J. C. Pinniger.

MR. FRANCIS WILLIAMS JOHNSON, solicitor, of Stockport, has been appointed Clerk to the Stockport Board of Guardians, in succession to the late Mr. Henry Coppock. Mr. Johnson was admitted in Trinity Term, 1859, and is a younger brother of Mr. William Johnson, coroner for Cheshire, to whom he has acted as deputy for some years, and with whom he is in partnership. The salary of the new clerk, who will also perform the duties of Superintendent Registrar, will be £200 per annum.

MR. ALFRED WOOD ELLIOTT, solicitor, of Hastings, has been elected vestry clerk of the parish of St. Mary's, Hastings, which office was rendered vacant by the death of Mr. John Phillips, solicitor.

MR. FREDERICK ADOLPHUS LANGHAM, solicitor, of Hastings, has been appointed solicitor to the parish of St. Leonards, in succession to the late Mr. John Phillips.

MR. SIMON DUNNING, solicitor, of Parliament-street, has been appointed Legal Secretary to the Right Rev. Dr. Durnford, the newly-appointed Bishop of Chichester. Mr. Dunning is a member of the legal firm of Burder & Dunning, which has acted for many years as secretaries to the late Bishop of Chichester.

MR. JOHN JOSEPH YATES, Solicitor, of Liverpool, has been appointed a Commissioner for affidavits in the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

T. B. has not sent his name and address.

Sir,—“A Barrister” in your impression of the 7th inst. reminds me that I have a “very simple remedy” in my own hands for the iniquitous system under which I am, as an attorney, debarred from pleading in the superior courts. I am at a loss to find out the “simplicity” of this remedy unless it be in the childish folly of eating dinners for twelve terms or in wasting three years of profitable energy in disgraceful sloth. This certainly is very simple, but unfortunately it is a little too catching. Does “A Barrister” for a moment suppose that any solicitor would be so foolish as to seek a remedy for such an iniquitous system in such a way? I am glad, however, to find that a gentleman of the other branch is now brought into the arena. His letter is one more proof of the little knowledge barristers have of the value of time.

I am perfectly acquainted with the case of Scott v. Stansfield, which I admit must be held to be the law until revised. The interpretation, however, put upon it by “A Barrister” is incorrect. It does not apply to attorneys having the conduct of a cause. It was an action by a solicitor against a county court judge for slander uttered by the judge in a case tried before him in which the solicitor himself was the defendant, and addressed to him when he was giving evidence in the witness-box. The Lord Chief Baron and Baron Channell were careful not to lay down that a judge is altogether irresponsible for slander against persons who are not parties to the cause. If, as your correspondent states, it decided that “no county court judge any more than any other judge of any court of record is answerable for any comments on the conduct of the attorneys in the court, no matter how false, malicious, or irrelevant his comments may be,” we might just as well cease to be a profession. That a false, malicious, irrelevant “slander” can be levelled against any man without a remedy, is contrary to the spirit of the English law. If, therefore, the case were as “A Barrister” puts it, it would only show the necessity of some interference by the Legislature. How that decision was arrived at, however, can easily be seen. It was conducted by barristers, defended by barristers, and decided by barristers. They, of course, will shelve all the responsibility they can and make “nunkey pay for all.” This same desire to get rid of responsibility, no doubt actuated my counsel on the occasion in question, and led them to think no explanation necessary.

London, May, 1870.

[This is rather silly.—ED. S.J.]

A SOLICITOR.

MR. ADAM PATERSON, a member of the firm of Paterson, Forbes, & Barr, solicitors, of Glasgow, has been appointed Dean of the Faculty of Procurators in that city.

The Indian papers, as cited by the Globe, report a “scene in court” at the Bombay Criminal Sessions on April 12, in which Mr. Chisholm Anstey, the late Bridgewater election commissioner, after obstinately refusing to sit down when required to do so by the judge (Sir C. Sargeant), was nominally committed for contempt of court. A Bridgewater newspaper, which cannot abide Mr. Anstey, hails this event, apparently, as calculated to salve, in some measure, the outraged feelings of Bridgewater.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

March 9.—The Naturalization Bill. Consideration of the Commons' amendments. The Lord Chancellor explained that there were only four, to which he hoped they would agree. In clause 2 (enabling aliens to hold property), the Commons had struck out the proviso empowering the Queen in Council to suspend its operation with regard to the enjoyment of property by aliens, subjects of any state at war with Her Majesty, during the continuance of such hostilities. This proviso had appeared to him scarcely necessary, since during a time of war, there would be ample power to take action with regard to the subjects of an enemy who had settled or held property in this country. The aim of the bill—though it could not be thoroughly carried out—was to enable any person with a double allegiance to elect which country he would be a subject of. Clause 14 accordingly provided that any person who by being born within the British dominions became a British subject, but who became at his birth under the law of any foreign state a subject thereof, might, if of full age and not subject to any disability, make a declaration of alienage, and cease to be a British subject. Now, the Commons had added the converse proposition—that a person born out of Her Majesty's dominions who by reason of parentage was a British subject should in like manner be able to make a declaration of alienage and cease to be a British subject. This he thought an improvement, for it made the position of both countries a reciprocal one. The term of three years' residence adopted by their lordships as a qualification for naturalization had been extended by the Commons to five years, which was the period required in Prussia, and he believed at present in the United States. Considering that naturalization would confer the full privilege of citizenship, including a seat in Parliament and membership of the Privy Council, their lordships, he trusted, would assent to this. The Commons had also added a money clause, enabling the Home Secretary to fix the fees payable on certificates and declarations, which could not properly have been inserted by their lordships.—The amendments were agreed to accordingly.

May 10.—The Sequestration of Benefices Bill of last session, reintroduced by the Marquis of Hartington, was read a first time.

May 12.—Ecclesiastical Dilapidations.—A bill by the Archbishop of Canterbury was read a first time.

The Ecclesiastical Patronage Transfer Bill passed through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

May 6.—Illegal Lotteries.—Mr. Charley, after giving a sketch of the law on the subject, complained that while the Government enforced the law against other lotteries, they allowed Roman Catholic lotteries to go scot-free.—Mr. Bruce in reply said that where lotteries were got up not for gain, but for good objects, the Home Office practice was to communicate with the parties, pointing out the illegality of the affair, and such interference always succeeded in attaining its object. He doubted whether more direct interference would be approved by Parliament in cases where the lottery was for pious and charitable purposes. In reply to Mr. Sinclair Aytoun he stated that it was within his power and consistent with his duty, to determine when the law, as laid down in a particular Act of Parliament, should or should not be enforced.—Mr. Whalley accepted Mr. Bruce's reply as an avowal that the Roman Catholic religion ought to be extended.

The Irish Land Bill.—Adjourned committee. Clause 4 (Compensation for improvements) was resumed, and having been amended, on the motion of Dr. Ball, by adding leases for lives to the leases for thirty-one years which bar compensation, was agreed to.—Clause 5 (Presumption in tenant's favour).—Mr. Plunket moved an amendment originally proposed by Sir R. Palmer, to limit this clause to future tenancies.—The amendment was ultimately rejected by a majority of 191 to 132.—Mr. C. Fortescue added a proviso excepting from the presumption against the landlord improvements made before the acquisition of the estate by the existing landlord and improvements made under leases granted twenty years before the Act on holdings over £100 annual value.—The clause was then carried by a majority of 167 to 103.

The Railways (Powers of Construction) Bill passed through committee, an amendment proposed by Mr. Brogden, that every hearing by the Board of Trade of an opposed application should be in public, having been rejected by a majority of 31 to 16.

Common Enclosure.—Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen introduced a bill to amend the law.

The Irish Land Bill.—Adjourned committee. Clause 6 (Compensation for other improvements).—Dr. Ball moved but withdrew on the understanding that the point would be considered by the Government, an amendment limiting the operation of the clause to yearly tenants.—An amendment by Mr. Pim, to extend to tenants of town plots the protection given to tenants of agricultural holdings, was negative.—An amendment by Mr. Bruen was agreed to, providing that "out of any moneys payable to the tenant under this section all sums due to the landlord from the tenant in respect of rent, or of any deterioration of the holding, or arising from the non-observance of any express or any implied covenant or agreement, and also any sums payable by the tenant for taxes due in respect of the holding and not recoverable from the landlord, may, if not deducted under the provisions of section 4 of this Act, be deducted by the landlord."—Dr. Ball added at the end of the section a proviso that the section should not apply to any money or money's worth which has been paid during the existence of a lease made before the passing of the Act. The clause, with other verbal amendments, was then agreed to.—Clause 7 (Compensation in respect of crops).—Mr. C. S. Read inserted an amendment providing that this shall only be given in the absence of written agreement to the contrary.—Clause 8 (Definition of the limitation as to disturbance in holding).—An amendment by Dr. Ball, providing that eviction for breach of a reasonable covenant should not be deemed disturbance, was rejected by a majority of 194 to 113.—Mr. Corrance moved an amendment substituting for that part of the clause which empowers the court on special grounds to hold ejectment for non-payment of rent not to be disturbance, a general proviso enabling the court to treat persons evicted for non-payment as persons retiring voluntarily. Landlords should have adequate security, and the words of the clause were, he urged, uncertain.—Mr. C. Fortescue said the clause was entirely restricted to tenancies existing at the passing of the Act. An unwholesome system of extravagant rents having been found to exist, the clause proposed to enable the court to consider that matter as to previous tenancies, leaving the question as regarded the future.—Mr. Hardy could not see why, if in future ejectment for non-payment of rent was not to be disturbance, existing engagements should be interfered with. He objected, however, to the form of the amendment.—Mr. Corrance explained that all he proposed to leave to the court was the amount to be paid.—Mr. Gladstone said that a reckless competition having been created amongst tenants, and rents having been raised by strange landlords, often on the tenant's own improvements, to such an extent that it was often quite impossible for the tenants to meet such engagements, it was now desired to obtain a fresh starting point in order to bring about a strict observance of the conditions of contract in Ireland. To meet the difficulty he would suggest the addition of words to render the clause applicable only to tenancies existing at the passing of the Act, and which had continued without any alteration of terms and conditions.—Mr. Gregory agreed that the cases of exorbitant rent ought to be reached, but he feared that this clause, taken with clause 17 (Restriction on eviction), would create fixity of tenure without payment of rent.—Mr. Brodick deprecated the encouraging of tenants by any uncertainty to raise questions of the fairness of rent, after they had ceased to pay it, or the thrusting on the court of such onerous questions.—Lord Elcho remarked that the Government of this country were now for the first time proposing to fix the price of an article.—The Solicitor-General for Ireland said the Government were not proposing anything like a regulation of prices, and if they were it would not be for the first time. The hard cases must be provided for, and the clause with the modification provided for by Mr. Gladstone would work satisfactorily. The result of the whole clause thus amended would be that an ejectment for non-payment of rent would not be deemed a disturbance of the tenant unless in the case of a person claiming compensation on the determination of a tenancy existing at the time of the passing of the Act, and continuing to exist up to the time of its determination without any alteration of rent. In that shape the clause would apply only to a limited class of cases, and to those only in the event of special grounds being shown.—Mr. Bruen's amendment was then rejected by a majority of 132 to 55, and Mr. C. Fortescue inserted the amendment proposed by Mr. Gladstone.—Clauses 8 and 9 were agreed to with verbal amendments.—Clause 10. Mr. Chichester Fortescue said the Government intended to give perfect freedom of contract to parties above the line of £50 valuation. To all tenants below that line the protection which the Act gave would be extended, but above that line parties would be at liberty to make contracts, no matter in what respect these contracts might differ from the basis of the Act. It was, accordingly, unnecessary to enact special provisions relating to tenancies above the line of £50. The clause, having been amended accordingly, was agreed to.—Clause 11 (Exemption). "Town parks" were added to the exemptions from compensation.—Mr. C. Fortescue also added an amendment exempting holdings used for pasture only, saving to the tenant his claim under clause 4. He also accepted an amendment introducing a limitation to £50 valuation. The clause was then agreed to.—Clause 12 (Proceedings by tenants).—Sir J. Gray hoped the Solicitor-General for Ireland would define the Ulster tenant-right and the powers which would be given to tenants under the clause.—The Solicitor-General for Ireland said that the Ulster tenant from year to year would have an estate equivalent to an estate in fee simple in his occupancy, which he would be entitled to sell to an incoming tenant and to convey by deed. The bill proposed to legalise, but it did not propose to define, the Ulster custom. If the Ulster landlord chose to break through the Ulster custom, the Ulster tenant would be able to bring him into court, where he would be compelled to pay such compensation as the Court might think fit after a careful consideration of all the circumstances attending the individual case.—Sir J. Gray objected to the clause because by its provisions no man could make a claim until he was about to quit his holding.—Mr. C. Fortescue inserted, in consequence of a suggestion by Mr. Walpole, words providing that where a claim is made under section 3 of the Act, the number of years rent claimed shall be specified. The clause was then agreed to.—Clause 13 (Proceedings by landlord) was agreed to with verbal amendments.—Clause 14 ("Equities clause") was, after several complaints of its vagueness, agreed to with verbal amendment only.—Clause 15 (Derivative estates in the same holding) was agreed to.—Clause 16 (Lease in lieu of compensation).—Mr. C. Fortescue carried, by a majority of 250 to 148, the omission of this clause.

The Bridgewater, Beverley, and Norwich Voters' Disfranchisement Bills were read a third time and passed.

The Stamp Duty on Deeds Bill.—Mr. Bourke consented to postpone the motion for the second reading, on the understanding that he should have a future opportunity if the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not able to press forward a measure on the subject.

The Felony Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Mortgage Debenture Act (1865) Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

Law of Parliamentary Elections Amendment Bill.—The Marquis of Hartington, in introducing this bill, said it was founded mainly on the report of the recent committee, though diametrically opposed to it, as to the abolition of nomination days. For the present public ceremony the bill proposed to substitute a system of private nominations. Commenting on the principal objections to the ballot, he met the argument that voting, as a public trust, should involve a public responsibility, by saying that purity and freedom of election were as important as publicity. With regard to the objection that the secret voting would render bribery and personation impossible of detection, he replied that under the scheme embodied in the bill it would, it was believed, be quite possible to identify the votes for judicial purposes.—Mr. Leatham would have preferred a ballot bill pure and simple and would not withdraw his own.—Mr. Fawcett lamented that the expenses of the election were not to be thrown upon the constituencies.—The bill was read a first time and the second reading fixed for May 30.

May 10.—The Bribery Prosecutions.—Sir Henry Edwards.—Mr. Horsman, to elicit an explanation from the Attorney-General, called attention to a letter written to the Times by Sir H. Edwards' son, in which the writer said that the Beverley Commissioners had not, as stated by the Attorney-General in a recent debate, recommended the prosecution of Sir H. Edwards, but, on the contrary, disapproved of it.—The Attorney-General said that the Act of 1863 provided that the commissioners' report, and the evidence against any person who had not received a certificate, should be laid before the Attorney-General. He would gladly have deferred instituting prosecutions against Sir H. Edwards and the others till he could take the opinion of the House; but that course was not open to him, because the Act required that the prosecution, if begun at all, should be begun within twelve months from the commission of the offence. The Beverley Commissioners, in what they called their interim report, stated certain facts as to Sir H. Edwards, adding that they did not deem it their duty to examine him. He and the Solicitor-General examined the evidence with Mr. Archibald, the Permanent Counsel to the Treasury (than whose opinion no better could be obtained), and came to the conclusion that they were bound to submit the evidence to a jury. Mr. Barstow, one of the commissioners, had afterwards changed his mind, considering that Sir H. Edwards was entitled to a certificate of indemnity, but he (the Attorney-General) could not hold that anyone was entitled to such a certificate who had not been compelled to answer questions tending to criminate himself. He had had no choice but to direct the prosecution.

Public Prosecutions.—A motion by Sir D. Wedderburn, for a select committee to inquire into the present system of conducting public prosecutions in Scotland, with the view of amending that system if necessary, and of extending to other parts of the United Kingdom the institution of public prosecutors, was negatived without a division.

The Income Tax—Schedule D.—A motion by Mr. Whalley, for a select committee to inquire into the mode of assessing the income tax under schedule D, was negatived without a division.

Conventual and Monastic Institutions.—The Select Committee was nominated as follows:—Mr. Villiers, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Jessel, Mr. Thomas Chambers, Mr. Matthews, Mr. Howes, Mr. Cogan, Mr. Pemberton, The O'Connor Don, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Sherlock, Mr. John Gilbert Talbot, Mr. Pease, Mr. George Gregory, and Sir John Ogilvy.—Mr. Eykyn added an instruction to the committee that it had power to include in its inquiry Anglican and all other conventual and monastic institutions in Great Britain of a conventual or monastic character.—Mr. H. Matthews wished that the committee should be so instructed as that no member of an order who might be called upon for evidence should be compelled or called upon to make minute statements that could lead to the property of his monastery being forfeited by its being shown to be held under a title that was bad in law. He, therefore, moved "That it be an instruction to the committee not to inquire into matters which would involve a criminal charge against any person, or the forfeiture of any legal or equitable interest in property."—Mr. Gladstone replied that there was no ground for apprehensions about property. He emphatically declined such a limitation of a field of inquiry which so large a majority of the House had marked out.

The Wine and Beerhouses Act (1869) Amendment Bill passed through committee.

The County Court Buildings Bill.—The Lords' amendments were agreed to.

May 11.—The Benefices Bill.—Mr. Cross moved the second reading. He believed the clergy approved it. Nothing was further from its intention than to interfere with lay patronage, which was of very ancient date. After sketching the history of the law of the sale of advowsons he observed that the right of presentation, like other property, was the subject of sale, but the exercise of the right was a public trust, and therefore void, if made for pecuniary consideration. It was like the case of a vote. A man had a right to vote, but he was forbidden to sell that right. He might buy the property which gave the right of voting if he chose, or he might sell it, but so long as he retained it and the right to vote in connection with it, the law said if he sold the exercise of that right he was guilty of bribery, and would be punished. So, in the case of an advowson, the owner, if he wished, might sell the right to presentation, but when he sold the exercise of that right he did that which the law should not allow. He only asked the House, with reference to this property, to take another step in the course which had been followed by legislation at various periods of our history. At the time of Elizabeth a presentation might not be sold while the living was void; at the time of the Union it could not be sold to a clergyman; and he now only asked them to take the further step pointed out by Chief Justice Best—namely, that the actual sale of the next presentation ought not to be allowed, whether that was done by a grant, or any contrivance of selling the advowson and buying it back, or by any covenant to buy it back, or by any contrivance of buying an actual living when the incumbent was in extreme danger of death. There were provisos in the bill which would prevent its falling harshly on individuals. It would not come into operation for some time, in order that arrangements already made might be carried out without a hardship. There was a proviso which saved livings which had been put in existing settlements, as it would not be fair to disturb family arrangements which had been made certainly without expecting the passing of a measure of this kind; but for the future no such settlements could be allowed. There was also a saving provision in the case of persons who had bought next presentations for their sons, who might have died, or changed their minds, or gone into other professions.—Mr. Beresford Hope regretted the existence of facts rendering some action necessary, but hoped the bill would not be pressed to a second reading. He approved of lay patronage. He feared the bill would not stop the wrong, and would be evaded by secret sales. The worst evil was the presenting a living to a clergyman on the understanding that he was to resign as soon as a son or nephew came of age. The cure for these evils he suggested might be found in allowing sales of next presentations through the office of the bishop of the diocese, a certain amount of the purchase-money being retained for the benefit of the Church of England, and the bishop having powers of examination and rejection beyond what he at present possessed. This would be better than leaving it open to a bankrupt patron to make a presentation on the assurance that shortly after some spiritual "man in the moon" would make him a present of a sum of money. To meet the case of a patron who desires to present his relative, at the time not in holy orders, he would make the bond of resignation absolutely illegal, and allow the patron to request permission of the bishop to refrain from presenting until his intended nominee was eligible, the bishop appointing a curate. He, however, mainly trusted to the growth of morality for the correction of these evils.—The Solicitor-General said there was no sign of increased moral responsibility among lay patrons. Cases came daily before him which he could not believe did not the evidence compel him. He approved of lay patronage and recommended the bill for a second reading.—Mr. Hinde Palmer, Mr. Hardy, and Dr. Ball supported it.—Mr. Henley thought it would strike at the root of lay patronage.—The bill was read a second time.

The County Coroners (Ireland) Bill.—On the motion for the second reading this bill was thrown out by a majority of 172 to 98.

The Suburban Commons Bill was read a second time.

May 12.—The Irish Land Bill (Adjourned Committee).—Clause 17 (Restrictions on eviction) resumed.—Dr. Ball carried an amendment giving the court a discretion of suspending the general rule that a tenant shall be compelled to quit till his compensation has been paid him. The clause was then agreed to.—Clause 18 (Courts) was agreed to, proposals, by Dr. Brewer to substitute for the civil bill court a court to be formed by the Lords Lieutenant grouping together from time to time the civil bill courts of their adjoining counties, and by Mr. W. Shaw substituting a judge of the Landed Estates Court going circuit as required, having been negatived.—Clause 19 (Courts) was amended by Dr. Ball by the addition of a valuer to act as an assessor, another amendment also by Dr. Ball to dispense with a jury for the questions of fact, having been rejected.—Clauses 20—23 (Courts and procedure) and clauses 24—27 (Leases by limited owners) were agreed to, with unimportant amendments. These were the last of the occupation clauses.—Part II. Sales to tenants.—Mr. C. Fortescue amended clause 28 so as to strike out the Board of Works from part 2 of the bill, substituting "the court." On clause 37 Dr. Ball succeeded in providing that this court shall not be the civil bill court. Clause 31 having been expunged as tautologous, the clauses to the end of part II. were agreed to, and progress reported.

The Poor Law Relief (Metropolis) Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Women's Disabilities Bill.—On the order for committee this bill was, on the motion of Mr. Bouverie, thrown out by a majority of 220 to 94.

OBITUARY.

MR. B. WALKER.

Mr. Banes Walker, solicitor, of Alford, Lincolnshire, died on the 21st April, at the early age of thirty-seven years. He was admitted in Michaelmas Term, 1855, and was in partnership with Mr. L. Wilson, clerk to the local magistrates.

MR. H. A. WILDES.

The death of Mr. Henry Atkinson Wildes, solicitor, formerly of Maidstone, took place at Folkestone on the 6th of May, in the seventy-ninth year of his age. Mr. Wildes was admitted in Trinity Term, 1816, and for many years fulfilled the office of Clerk of the Peace for the county of Kent, and was also Clerk to the Lieutenancy.

MR. J. W. WILLIAMSON.

Mr. John Wilkins Williamson, barrister-at-law, died at Exeter on the 22nd of April, aged 79 years. He was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in November, 1841, and practised for many years as a conveyancer in London.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

The next meeting will be held on Wednesday, the 18th of May, at 8 p.m., precisely, when Mr. Philip Vernon Smith will read a paper on "The Law of Forfeiture for Treason and Felony." The Hon. George Denman, M.P., will preside. The Council will meet at half-past seven.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society held on Tuesday, 10th May, Mr. Widdows in the chair, the question for discussion was No. 453 Legal:—"Does the addition of a further maker to a promissory note, after it has become a perfect instrument, discharge the original maker from liability?" : Cotton v. Simpson (8 Ad. & El. 136); Gardner v. Walsh (3 W. R. 460, 1 Jur. N. S. 828).

Mr. Burrell opened the debate in the affirmative, and Mr. L. Hunter in the negative, and the question was ultimately decided in the affirmative.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATION.

The Examiners have appointed Thursday, the 2nd of June, for the intermediate examination of persons under articles of clerkship to attorneys; candidates for examination are to attend on that day at half-past nine in the forenoon, at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, London. The examination will commence at ten o'clock precisely, and close at 4 o'clock.

Articles, &c., to be left with the secretary of the Incorporated Law Society on or before Wednesday, the 13th of May.

The regulations in all other respects are identical with those already published.

FINAL EXAMINATION.

The Examiners have appointed Monday, the 30th, and Tuesday, the 31st of May, for the examination of persons applying to be admitted attorneys; candidates for examination are to attend on those days at half-past nine in the forenoon of each day, at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery Lane, London. The examination will commence at ten o'clock precisely, and close at four o'clock.

Articles, &c., to be left with the Secretary of the Incorporated Law Society on or before Wednesday, the 26th of May.

In all other respects the regulations for this examination are exactly similar to those already published.

COURT PAPERS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

During the Whitsun Vacation all applications to the Court of Chancery which are of an urgent nature are to be made to or at the chambers of the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Milbourne James.

All applications for leave to give notice of motion only, may be made to the chief clerk at chambers.

The Vice-Chancellor's address can be obtained on application at his Honour's chambers, 11, New-square, Lincoln's-inn.

The chambers of the Vice-Chancellor James will be open on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday in every week, from 11 till 1 o'clock.

The Whitsun Vacation will commence on Monday, 16th May, and terminate on Tuesday, 24th May, both days inclusive.

There will not be any sittings during Term in London.

AFTER TERM.

Middlesex.

London.

Friday June 17 | Friday July 1
The Court will sit at Nisi Prius on Mondays at half-past 10 o'clock, and on all other days at 10 o'clock.

The causes in the list for each of the above sitting days in Term, if not disposed of on those days, will be tried by adjournment on the days following each of such sitting days.

ORDER OF COURT.—Easter Term, 1870.

Cor.—COCKBURN, C.J., BLACKBURN, and MELLOR, JJ.
(Read in open Court Cockburn, C.J., 11th May, 1870.)

That in future, except during the first four days and the last four days of Term, this Court will sit in two divisions on every Wednesday.

But there will in these days be no sitting at Nisi Prius. And that in the Full Court the new trials will be taken or such other business as the Court may from time to time direct in its order, and in the Bail Court the Crown paper with the exception of such cases as may be postponed as of importance.

COMMON PLEAS.

May 9, 1870.

This Court will, in Trinity Term next, form a Second Court to sit in banc on the following days—viz., Tuesday, May 31, Wednesday, June 1, Monday, June 6, and Tuesday, June 7, and such Second Court will proceed with the cases standing in the Special Paper, in addition to the usual days appointed for that purpose.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

In spite of an active and increasing demand for money, the funds opened without alteration. Soon, however, the news from France of the result of the Plebiscite, added to her money demand, occasioned an advance, at which the market is still firm. Railways, which opened heavily, have since been in rather active demand, but are now only in moderate request. Great Northern have receded on realisations after the late rise. The favourable traffic returns of the North Eastern and Midland have caused those lines to be in some request. Foreign securities opened dull but became brisker, and are now, on the settlement of the fortnightly account, quite active.

The Porto Rico Irrigation Company (Limited) invite subscriptions for £140,000 9 per cent. mortgage debentures at the price of £46 per £50 debenture payable by instalments, and offer a bonus of one fully paid-up £5 share-warrant to each £50 debenture when fully paid-up.

The Town Council of Blackburn have increased the salary of Mr. Henry Hoyle, clerk to the borough justices, from £330 to £430 per annum.

Mr. J. Harvey Boys, solicitor, has resigned the coronership of Margate, to which he was appointed at the latter end of last year, in consequence of ill-health. His son, Mr. Athelstan H. Boys, is a candidate for the vacant office, which is in the gift of the Town Council.

The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, MAY 21, 1870.

THE MOTION of which Sir Roundell Palmer has given notice, with reference to the Greek massacre, may raise some interesting questions of law as to the status of an ambassador or his suite in a foreign country. It is admitted that an ambassador is entitled to many privileges, and, in virtue of the "sanctity of his character," is clothed with some important immunities. The question is how far those privileges and immunities extend. According to the irrepressible "Historicus," whose cosmopolitan information appears to enable him to instruct the public upon every conceivable subject at the shortest notice, the "sacredness of his character belongs to the minister at all times, upon all occasions, and in all places within the territory to which he is accredited. He can claim it eundo, redeundo, et morando." The immunity which belongs to his profession is borne about with him everywhere sleeping or waking, in recreation as well as in business. "If you kill me it's murder, but if I kill you it's nothing," was the salutation of Leech's little special constable in '48 to the brawny ruffian supposed to be about to subvert the constitution. Much the same sort of protection, in the opinion of "Historicus," surrounds an ambassador and his secretaries. Some of the latter are young, and it is not impossible that in this country they might one night find themselves involved in some of those riotous frolics in which youth, with wild oats yet to sow, is supposed to delight. If such a catastrophe should occur, and an uncompromising policeman should lay hands on the sacred person of an excited attaché, what fearful consequences might ensue! There would be a casus belli at once, unless a handsome compensation were immediately made to the injured prisoner. The divinity wherewith he is hedged extends, says that great jurist, "Historicus," to "the opera box," and we presume would cover him "morando" in less reputable resorts.

It is indeed scarcely possible to speak seriously of such extravagance as is contained in the letter of "Historicus" to the Times. Fortunately, he is not likely to mislead anyone, for leading columns of the same paper have during the past week contained the true and sensible interpretation of the privilege of ambassadors. They, and their immediate suite, are no doubt, exempt from all ordinary local jurisdiction, civil or criminal. They remain, in all respects, citizens of the state from whence they came; they carry their own laws with them; their children are regarded as natives of their own country, though born abroad. But just as a minister who chooses to engage in mercantile pursuits in the country where he is sent to reside, loses quoad these pursuits his inviolability, and subjects his property, excepting so much of it as may be necessary for the legitimate purposes of his diplomatic calling, to attachment for debt (Bynkershoek de foro Legatorum, c. 16), so if he lays aside his official duties, and for the time becomes an ordinary tourist, he must take his chance with other travellers. England can and ought to insist on redress for the murder of Mr. Herbert, not because he was a member of Mr. Erskine's staff, but because he was an Englishman. It seems to us that his case stands exactly on the same footing as those of Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Viner; and when, on the broad principles of international justice, we have such a good case as regards all these unfortunate victims, what is the use of singling out one of them, and of attempting on his behalf to substantiate special claims which are repugnant to common sense, and also, we believe, to the law of nations?

THE DECISION RECENTLY PRONOUNCED by Sir Robert Phillimore in the case of Martin v. Jackson, upon which so much unfavourable comment has been expressed, will, we trust, draw the attention of legal reformers to the query whether there should not be some reform in the constitution of the Ecclesiastical Court, at any rate in cases where the questions involved concern not the doctrinal orthodoxy, but the moral qualifications of clergymen of the Church of England. We have no desire to express any opinion upon the particular case of Mr. Jackson. Indeed, as notice of appeal has been given it would be improper to do so. But we have observed of late a disposition, on the part of persons whose opinion is entitled to respect, to complain of the present state of the law ecclesiastical wherever a matter of personal character and reputation is concerned. For our own part we do not think it expedient that any clergyman should be compelled to stake his whole professional status—which is, indeed, almost his life—upon the view which a solitary individual, well meaning and honest though he may be, may take of a vast mass of contradictory and perplexing evidence. The public, too, have, it is said, a right to demand that the trial of one of the ministers of the Established Church should take place before a tribunal whose liability to mistake would be presumably less than that of any one man however gifted, painstaking, and anxious to do justice.

It is certainly true that where evidence is contradictory and witnesses are called whose testimony, upon paper, is utterly incapable, upon any reasonable theory, of being reduced into harmony—where, in short, the grossest and most deliberate perjury has been committed on one side or the other—trial by jury is very successful. It is really extraordinary how certainly a jury by a sort of "unerring instinct" find out who is the witness of truth or who is not. The Chief Justice of England in his recent letter to the Lord Chancellor has recognised the supreme excellence, in all cases where there are complicated disputes of fact, of this mode of trial. No doubt there are certain cases in which a jury would be and are of no use. For example, it would be useless to take their opinion on the legality of incense or lighted candles. The late brother of the present Dean of Arohes, who certainly was in the habit of expressing somewhat violent opinions, gave in his work, on evidence et omnibus rebus aliis, the opinion that in civil cases a jury is generally useless, but he decidedly approved it in criminal matters. Baron Bramwell, in giving evidence recently upon the subject, said that if he wanted nothing but the truth in a particular case he should prefer an intelligent judge practised in such questions. But in answer to the question whether his own experience had led him to be dissatisfied with jury trials, Baron Bramwell said "No;" and in proceeding to point out certain classes of cases in which juries habitually go wrong, the learned judge observed—"You may say to them, 'the question is not whether the man is innocent, but whether there is absence of reasonable cause and malice,' but in vain, they find for the innocent man." The truth is that in criminal cases the jury very seldom go wrong, and it would be superfluous for us to point out the affinity of cases in which charges are made against the characters of clergymen to "criminal cases" proper. Why then should not the Dean of Arohes have power given him to summon a jury to determine such questions as were raised in Martin v. Jackson? It would, we are sure, be a relief to him to have such assistance, and the verdict of the jury would command—we may say it without any want of respect—more confidence than that of the judge sitting alone and unassisted. Even in a running down case in the Court of Admiralty the same judge receives the assistance of nautical assessors. Surely in an inquiry which really concerns interests infinitely more important than can by any possibility be at issue in any admiralty cause, similar help should be rendered to him. We think that no clergyman should be liable to suspension or deprivation for any alleged offence against morals, without having the charge against him investigated by the ordinary and satisfactory criminal tribunal of the country.

It is said that the Habitual Criminals Act, 1869, (32 & 33 Vict. c. 99), is to be amended this session, and it may, therefore, be useful to recall some of the chief defects of this statute, on which we have already commented several times.

The statute (besides some miscellaneous provisions) deals with three classes of criminals—viz., convicts at large under licences, habitual criminals, and receivers of stolen goods. As regards the first two classes, and, to a limited extent, as to the third class, the ordinary presumption of innocence is, under certain circumstances, reversed, and guilt is presumed until innocence is proved. The sections embodying the chief provisions of the Act are drawn very carelessly, and several questions have already arisen upon them.

By section 8, if any person is convicted on indictment of any of certain specified offences "and he be proved to have been previously convicted of" any of certain offences, he is to be subject to police supervision after the term of his imprisonment. Nothing is said as to the time or mode of the proof of the previous conviction. The effect of this omission has already been felt. A prisoner was convicted before the Recorder of Bolton on an indictment which contained no charge of any prior conviction. A prior conviction was, however, proved by visu voce evidence at the trial. The question was suggested, will the person be liable to supervision after the expiration of his imprisonment? That is, was the prior conviction sufficiently proved within the meaning of section 8?

The supervision is no part of the sentence, and the matter, therefore, is still in doubt. A case very like this (Reg. v. Summers, 17 W. R. 384), had already arisen shortly before the statute was passed, and indeed the bill at first contained a clause (section 19) providing that a previous conviction might be proved, although not charged in the indictment, and without production of the record of such previous conviction. This clause was, however, struck out.

Again, in Reg. v. Harwood, on the Home Circuit last spring assizes, a difficulty arose in construing section 11, which enacts that on proceedings against persons as receivers of stolen goods, a previous conviction of certain specified offences may be proved "as evidence" of the prisoner's knowledge that the goods were stolen, provided that notice is given to the prisoner "that proof is intended to be given of his previous conviction, and that he will be deemed to have known such goods to have been stolen until he has proved the contrary." Keating, J., held that the words of the notice do not extend the enacting part of the section so as to throw upon the accused the onus of proving his innocence. In the same case the question was raised whether a bank note was included in the word "goods" in this action. The prisoner was acquitted, so that these points have not been argued.

As we have said, the onus of proving innocence is, under certain circumstances, thrown upon criminals, but there is no provision enabling them to give evidence. It seems hard to raise a presumption of guilt against a man and then to forbid him to rebut it by his own evidence, more especially as the matters requiring proof under this statute are peculiarly within the knowledge of the accused, for instance, "that he is not getting his livelihood by dishonest means."

Section 10 is also very objectionable. By it any person keeping a "lodging-house, beer-house, public-house, or any other place where exciseable liquors are sold, or place of public entertainment or resort," who knowingly harbours thieves "or allows the deposit of goods therein, having reasonable cause for believing them to be stolen, shall be liable" to a penalty of £10. Comment is hardly necessary on this section.

Of all the criminal classes receivers are the most injurious. At the same time they are the most easily discovered, because they must have fixed abodes. They are therefore the persons upon whom the criminal law could and ought to operate most effectually. No one disputes this, but it seems as if the framers of section 10 had forgotten it. The offence under the section is restricted to harbouring thieves, &c., in places of public resort, and the penalty is so small that its infliction will not reduce the gains of the offenders to any appreciable extent. It is obvious that the section ought to extend to all persons who harbour thieves, &c., on their premises, irrespective of what other use the premises may be put to. The amount of the penalty should be such as to render the commission of offences against the section unmistakably unprofitable.

Want of space, and not want of matter, prevents our examining this statute any further at present. There are, however, many other faults in the statute, for instance, according to the literal interpretation of section 3, if a constable has reason to believe that a convict at large under a licence is getting a livelihood by dishonest means and it is found that "there are reasonable grounds for such belief," the convict may forfeit his licence as if convicted of an indictable offence, although it is found as a fact that the convict is not getting his livelihood by dishonest means.

WHEN A PARSON RUNS IN DEBT and his living is sequestrated, the result is that there is a great scandal, and the parish goes without the performance of those duties which a good parish minister would and should perform—to say nothing of the wretched effects of a continuing bad example set by the person who ought to preach by his own practice. The Bishop of Winchester and Lord Harrowby have each introduced into the House of Lords a bill designed to remedy this evil. Lord Harrowby's bill was utterly impracticable in its machinery, and was on that ground rightly rejected. The Bishop of Winchester proposes that, in future, sequestrations should be entirely abolished (he does not, of course, intend that the change should affect obligations already contracted), and that whenever a clergyman becomes bankrupt his benefice shall thereupon be vacated. If this measure were likely to prevent the recurrence of the sad state of things above alluded to, we should support it cordially; and it may be that if those who now give the credit could no longer rely on the income of the benefice, they would refuse the credit in the first instance. That, undoubtedly, would be a most happy result. It was hinted, however, by some of the law lords, that the effect of the change would be only to raise the terms of those who supply money and goods. Possibly in the case of officers in the army and other lay contractors of liabilities this may be so to some extent, undoubtedly so where the debts are on "accommodation bills"; we fancy, however, that the debts of bankrupt clergymen are usually tradesmen's accounts. But what would be the practical result of such a measure as that of the Bishop of Winchester? The result would be that no beneficed clergyman would ever become bankrupt. No creditor would ever be so blind to his own pecuniary interest as to take a step which would effectually destroy his chance of ever getting paid. Thus the contingency on which the benefice is to be handed over to a worthier incumbent would never arise, and the parish would continue with its parson steeped in debt, his creditors dunning him steadily on the strength of the stipend. Of the two, we believe that this state of things is worse than that where judges seem to have no uniform rules as to non-suits and judgments for defendants.

We annex a table in which is exhibited the proportion which nonsuits and judgments for defendant respectively bear to the totals of cases on the several circuits.

LORD ST. LEONARDS ON THE LAND TRANSFER
BILL AND OTHER LAW BILLS IN PARLIA-MENT.

Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, in a pamphlet which we noticed last week, makes a very dangerous onslaught on the Lord Chancellor's High Court of Justice and Appellate Jurisdiction Bills, under the guise of friendly criticism; but in the lately published "observations" of Lord St. Leonards on those and other bills no such mask is attempted, the observations from first to last breathe a tone of consistent unmitigated hostility.

His Lordship's observations do not perhaps add much that is new to the controversy upon these bills, but they bring out forcibly some of the most obvious of the objections to them. The most important of these objections, and that on which the noble writer dwells with most force and at greatest length, is the abnormal appearance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a controlling power throughout all these proposed changes; that dread functionary being, with the single exception of the Lord Chancellor, the only ex officio member either of the proposed Board of Land Registry or of the body to be entrusted with making rules and orders for the High Court of Justice. His Lordship is particularly, and justly, severe upon the provisions for carrying to the credit of the Consolidated Fund the fees to be levied off lands which pass through the registry, and he points his objection by an apt allusion to the Act of last year, by which the Government laid felonious hands upon the

"The Government measures would lead me to suppose that their object is to obtain a constant rule over all the great courts of justice in England and to appropriate to the reduction of the National Debt the funds accumulated by fees and charges, and so mixed up together as to prevent individual suitors from claiming their own. An Act has but just passed by which some millions of the security funds of the suitors in chancery have been taken by the Government for the reduction of the National Debt, and the Treasury are constituted the bankers of the suitors, and with power to take from time to time for ever any surplus for the National Debt. It ought to have been applied to the reduction of law taxes on suitors. The Treasury has made itself master of the Court of Chancery with a view of stripping the suitors from time to time for ever of its security funds. It renders reduction of law taxation hopeless, and it places the Government of the country in a false position. If we look at the bill now before us, we shall find that it is of the same character with that which disposed of the funds of the equity suitors. To carry the latter into execution an Act of Parliament was passed after the accumulated funds amounted to millions. The present bill, with the same object, appears, before any accumulation, to dispose by anticipation of the funds in like manner, and to provide also for the power of the Government over the Courts. One cannot fail to be surprised at finding the Chancellor of the Exchequer a prominent member of the Land Registry, and he is authorised to do any act or thing authorised to be done by the Board of Registration, having the like power as the Lord Chancellor has under the bill. We have already seen what extensive and unusual powers are given to the Board over the investment of moneys payable under judicial sales, the fees for registration, and costs generally, and any rules are made valid if approved by the Lord Chancellor and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The fees are at once to be paid in aid of the Consolidated Fund, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer's duty will, no doubt, be to look after the funds."

And again—

"The investment by the Court of the suitors' money, when they do not require it to be invested, is a safe and sure mode of accumulating millions, as we have seen. The sum acquired by the investment of suitors' money is treated as a fund for security of the suitors' money invested by their order; it is taken, we see, by the Government to reduce the National Debt. We should not steal leather to make poor men's shoes. Now, if any trustee were to act as the Court has done, the Court itself would quickly compel the trustee to refund every shilling of the accumulated fund. The Court should no longer be allowed to place the funds acquired by any investment of suitors' money to a general account, but every sum received from investments, whether required to be invested by the owners or not, should be separately carried to their several accounts and then justice would be done. . . . Then would many a household which imputes its misfortunes to the Court of Chancery with its heavy costs rejoice and give all honour when it is due. On the other hand, continue the present system, now it is explained, and the poor widow and orphan will find that a portion of the money taken by the Government to pay the National Debt was the produce of money paid into court by its order, which belonged to their husbands or fathers, and which of moral right belonged to them, and you may then learn what is the real operation of your taking from the poor that which rightly belongs to them. The mis-application of the fund injures the rich as well as the poor, but I must leave the former to protect themselves."

This is very forcible, and to a certain extent very just, though it is obvious that the individual suitor who has had his talent returned simply, because he preferred not to run the risk of investment, is not injured, and that the Court could not safely invest any of the cash at its command if it were to be answerable for all the profits, so as to have no set-off, or only the small per centage offered by Lord St. Leonards, against the cases of loss. Moreover, no such accumulation as that which has actually taken place would have been possible had not the price of the funds been steadily rising through a long series of years, a phenomenon which, for the future, and starting from present quotations, is simply impossible.

But though any attempt to deal with this fund as the property of individuals is obviously futile, it is not the less truly the property of "the suitors in Chancery," and ought, no doubt, to be applied for their benefit as a class, and we quite agree with Lord St. Leonards, that the honour of the country demands its restoration by the Treasury to the Court of Chancery.

On the question of compulsory registration, to which we have already taken exception, Lord St. Leonards makes some caustic observations which we cannot do better than transcribe verbatim:—

"The bill is peremptory and vindictive, but it does not explain what the effect of the punishment it inflicts will be. The deed, which is a conveyance of the fee, and carries the real contract into effect, is not "to pass any estate in the land, but shall operate only as a contract." Operate only as a contract! Why, surely the contract vests the equitable fee simple in the purchaser in defiance of the new law! Observe the situation of the parties. The purchaser has got the estate and nobody can take it from him. He has not got the legal fee simple, which I presume reverts in the seller, but he can make no use of it, and in fact might be ultimately compelled, if even he were unwilling, which he is not likely to be, once more to convey it to the purchaser; but this will lead to vexation, expense, and litigation. Here are two persons who stood fairly in the characters of vendor and purchaser, with the fee conveyed by the former to the latter, and suddenly, in order to obtain grist at the registry mill, the purchaser is divested of the legal estate in fee of which he may stand in need, and the seller is sure to be embarrassed by the naked fee simple returned to him contrary to his contract and conveyance, and, of course, contrary to his wish. This provision in the bill is quite in harmony with other parts as far as it gives to the measure the character of an Act for imposing additional taxes on real estates."

To this it might be added that this distinction between estate and contract is one of the obstacles to the much coveted fusion of law and equity which it is part of the function of the other Government bills to effect, and that the provision in question, if disregarded by courts of equity, will at most require an occasional additional application under the Trustee Act, 1850—i.e., will produce nothing but expense; while if enforced by those courts it will amount to a direct premium on fraud, not less objectionable than that already supplied by the course taken by the Court in cases where the Statute of Frauds is set up as a bar to an admitted contract.

The provision making the Court of Chancery a sort of court of probate for registered land is also objected to by Lord St. Leonards, but, so far as we can see, without just ground: that Court, upon which the duty of administration is thrown, would, on the contrary, seem to us the natural and proper tribunal to determine the devolution in every case, and not merely in the exceptional cases pointed at by the bill. We are surprised that a conveyancer of such eminence and experience as Lord St. Leonards does not see how objectionable is the present system, by which it is often impossible to tell to which of three courts recourse ought to be had in a case of disputed succession to land, and how valuable would be a provision which vested all jurisdiction with respect to the title to and possession of land in one and the same tribunal. That, as things are at present, the Court of Chancery would be the most convenient tribunal to select for this purpose is obvious without discussion.

On the other bills of this class now before Parliament Lord St. Leonards says comparatively little, and that little containing nothing which seems to us new, or newly put; but here his hostility to the proposed legislation is no less decided and indiscriminating than in respect of the Land Bill. He seems to us, however—with deference be it spoken—to have wholly misapprehended the scope and object of the contemplated amalgamation of the courts. Instead of seeing that it is intended that the division of labour as between the several chambers of the new court shall be practically as complete as that now existing as between independent courts, but that purely technical objections to the jurisdiction shall henceforth be utterly futile, he persists in treating the bill as a bill to compel each court and individual judge to entertain indiscriminately all sorts of suits and proceedings—i.e., to introduce the clauses of the Law and Equity Bill, 1860, for the defeat of which his Lordship justly takes so much credit to himself. But the object of this bill—and of the Report of the Commissioners—is the very opposite of this, and the power of transfer from division to division proposed to be given to the High Court shows, we think, conclusively that no such duality of jurisdiction as his Lordship deprecates, and the Lord Chief Justice seems to desire, is intended to be conferred upon any division of that court.

On the whole, while grateful to his Lordship for valuable arguments in forcible language against the objectionable parts of these bills, we are quite unable to concur in his general hostility to the proposed legislation, save only so far as regards the Land Transfer Bill, as to which we have already expressed an opinion which we have seen no reason whatever to change or modify.

THE LAW OF SIMONY.

Mr. Cross's bill to forbid the sale of next presentations is an honest endeavour to strike at the root of the traffic in appointments to benefices. Its introducer put the matter very neatly when he drew a parallel between presentations to livings and votes for members of Parliament. You may sell the property which qualifies its owner for a vote, and in so doing you sell the right to vote, but you are not to sell the exercise of that right—i.e., the vote itself. In like manner the right to present—that is the advowson or the next presentation—is saleable property, but the law forbids, or rather purports to forbid, the sale of the exercise of the right to present. The simony laws are practically an unavailing protest against what, to everyone's knowledge, is constantly taking place.

Will Mr. Cross's bill put an end to the system? In order to answer this question we will first take a cursory glance at the existing law and the manner in which it is evaded: we shall then be in a position to judge what is to be expected from the measure now before Parliament.

We need not attempt to trace the degrees by which the term "simony" came to possess its present significance; certainly what Blackstone calls the true notion of simony, the purchasing of holy orders or permission to preach, is more akin to the original offence of Simon Magus. One thing is clear, that the canon law has been very much stricter than the statute law in the matter. Ecclesiastical censures, however, not proving sufficient, the 31 Eliz., c. 6, defined the offence of simony, and provided that any simoniacal presentation should be void, and that the Crown might thereupon present to the benefice. Of this statute it was observed by De Grey, C.J., in Barrett v. Glubb, 2 Bl. Rep. 1052, that it did not follow all the wild notions of the canon law, but simply defined simony as a corrupt agreement to present. In addition to which statute the 12 Anne, c. 12, prohibited clergymen from buying next presentations for themselves.

The result of the law, statutory and judicial, is that a purchase of a next presentation during a vacancy is simony, and a purchase of the advowson under the same circumstances is void, quoad the next presentation. It is simony for any person to purchase a next presentation (and pro tanto as to the advowson) with an arrangement for procuring a vacancy. It is simony for a clergyman to purchase a next presentation for himself. It was doubted once whether it was simony to buy a next presentation, the incumbent being at the point of death. De Grey, C.J., however, in Barrett v. Glubb (sup.), felt unable to entertain any doubt but that this was not simony. Still, this opinion did not immediately obtain acceptance, and in Fox v. Bishop of Chester, 2 B. & Cr. 635, the contrary was ruled. That case, however, was overruled in the House of Lords (6 Bing. 20), Best, C.J., observing, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the judges of the Common Pleas:—

"Whilst the law, therefore, permits the next presentation of livings to be sold during the lives of the incumbents, as long as the incumbent is alive the sale is good. It would be difficult to establish a rule that should settle what degree of probability of the approaching death of an incumbent would prevent the sale of the next avoidance of a benefice, and more difficult to ascertain by evidence when an incumbent was within that rule."

The sentence which we have italicised conveys a strong objection to one of the clauses of Mr. Cross's bill.

It is perfectly well understood at large that the simony law is, so far as any practical prohibitory effect is concerned, a dead letter. Preferments are continually in the market, and are daily purchased by laymen expressly in order to present their friends, by clergymen expressly in order to present themselves, and with "immediate possession." In Sweet v. Meredith (10 W. R. 402, 3 Giff. 610), the owner of the advowson, whose son was the incumbent, sold it to another clergyman who wanted immediate possession; and a bargain was made that the incumbent should pay £5 per cent. interest on the purchase-money until resignation. It was contended in argument that this, as a penalty on non-resignation, was simoniacal, but Vice-Chancellor Stuart held the contrary. In practice, preferments are constantly sold to clergymen, who take covenants for large interest till a vacancy.

There is also, of course, the oath which every clergyman has to take before he is inducted into his new benefice.

Mr. Dart (V. & P. 159) says, the statute—

"Is not found in practice to prevent purchases of entire advowsons by clergymen, with the view to present themselves upon the next vacancies, but the terms of the Act and of the oath against simony generally present greater difficulties to the mind of the conveyancer than to that of the clerical casuist."

Mr. Cross thinks to put an end to the system by stopping the traffic in next presentations, and he thinks to stop the traffic by enacting that a presentation shall be void if obtained (1) by purchase in the name of the presentee or anyone else, (2) by purchase of the advowson with an agreement or arrangement for procuring a vacancy, or (3) by a purchase made when the incumbent is known to be "by sickness in, extreme danger of death." Advowsons settled under existing settlements are exempted from the operation of the measure, as also are sales or presentations made bona fide by mortgagees. Now the prohibition contained in (1) and (2) of the above alternatives simply adds in effect nothing whatever to the terms of the statute of Anne. The prohibition (3) will be practically nugatory, for the reason given by De Grey, C.J., in the case cited above, that in practice it is impossible to apply any such test with success. Of course an extreme case might occur in which there could be no doubt, but vendors and purchasers of preferment must be much clumsier than they now are, if this happened once in a hundred sales of preferment; and that being so, the rare operation of such a clause would produce no abatement of the practice, though it might perhaps beget a little popular sympathy with the party who should be stupid enough to stick between the bars. In fine, no one at all acquainted with the law and practice on this subject can fail to perceive that if Mr. Cross's bill was added to the existing law, it would place scarcely a single impediment in the way of the existing practice.

Having discovered that Mr. Cross's bill will do nothing, we may turn to this question—what is there to be done? It is said that there is an unseemliness (we use the phrase advisedly) in the idea that a clergyman should buy for himself or some one else should buy for him—the duty of serving God as parish priest of the village of Dale and the right of being paid the wage which man has set apart for that service. The thing may seem undesirable, but is it essentially so? Is not the real evil the possibility that the intending parson of Dale may not be going to do his duty there, may not be even understanding, or in his heart of hearts caring, what that duty really is. Some one must appoint the parson, and it seems to us that the system of lay-patronage is better than any other which we could substitute for it. Then, how is the actual appointment to be made? We cannot help thinking that there need be no scandal about the purchase of a preferment by a clergyman, if we could be sure that he was a fitting man for the preferment. If that can be assumed, and he is willing to take the benefice with its stipend minus the interest of the purchase-money, by all means let him.

We want to be able to think of every parish in England with its clergyman a good man, something, at least, of a scholar, and a gentleman. It is not necessarily a bad thing that the parson should have paid money directly for his position: unless by that means an improper man or an unsuitable man gets into the position. In truth that is where the shoe pinches. If we can ensure that the clergyman inducted to every living shall be the man who will do the work of a clergyman in it well, it will matter very little how he came by the presentation. If this object can, as far as human means may ensure anything of such a nature, be attained by some other method, it would be well to repeal the simony laws in toto. A law which inevitably is systematically evaded, stands on record certainly as a protest, but beyond this it is merely demoralising. It will perhaps be said that the bribery laws are a parallel case. That is not so. As to bribery, the prohibition is in itself just, and it is, as we hope and believe the next twenty years may show, not impossible to stop the act prohibited; as to purchases of preferment, we are not satisfied either that it is possible or that it is expedient to prevent them. The first is a moral as well as a legal offence; we cannot say the same as to the second.

It is proverbially easier to find fault with someone else's proposal than to propose a remedy of your own. We have, however, an idea upon the subject before us, and it is this: that the ultimate solution of the difficulty will be found in the repeal of the simony laws, providing, at the same time, some censorship and investigation into the efficiency of the presentee, the examining or scrutinising party or body being empowered, if necessary, to veto the presentation. Every proposed incumbent might, for instance, be required to show that he had worked efficiently for a certain number of years as a curate or other clerical labourer. We are aware that it may be found impracticable to invent a machinery for the exercise of such a discretion; but we should like to see some of the clever brains which are now busied on public affairs setting themselves to work to try if it cannot be done.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

SALE OF LAND BY AUCTION ACT, 1867.

Gilliatt v. Gilliatt, M.R., 18 W. R. 203.

Section 4 of this Act recites that there was at its passing a conflict between the law and equity courts in respect of the validity of sales by auction of land where a puffer had bid, though no right of bidding on behalf of the owner was reserved, the former holding all such sales absolutely illegal, and the latter, under some circumstances, giving effect to them, the rule being unsettled even in equity. The Act then, in order to settle the practice, enacts by section 5 that—

“The particulars or conditions of sale by auction of any land shall state whether such land will be sold without reserve or subject to a reserved price, or whether a right to bid is reserved; if it is stated that such land will be sold without reserve, or to that effect, then it shall not be lawful for the seller to employ any person to bid at such sale, or for the auctioneer to take knowingly any bidding from any such person.”

The old rule at law was that the employment of “puffers” invalidated the sale unless previously stipulated for (Bezwil v. Christie, Cowp. 395). There seems, however, to have been a doubt whether the employment of a single bidder only was illegal. Lord St. Leonards, judging from his earlier editions, seems formerly to have thought that authority was in favour of the practice; in Thornett v. Harries (15 M. & W. 371), however, a strong decision, though extrajudicial, was given against it, and of late years it was understood that at law no bidding for vendor was permitted, unless stipulated for. The Equity Courts, on the other hand, were in favour of permitting the vendor a certain license in order to prevent his property from going at an undervalue. Thus, in Bramley v. Alt (3 Ves. 620), where the puffer bid only up to the vendor's reserved price, all higher biddings being bond fide, the purchaser was decreed to take his purchase. This was followed in a similar case of Smith v. Clarke (12 Ves. 477). But in Mortimer v. Bell (14 W. R. 68, L. R. 1 Ch. 10), Lord Cranworth refused to carry this principle to the length of allowing two puffers to be employed to bid. Lord St. Leonards (V. & P. 10) considered it “highly desirable that the courts of law should adopt the equitable rule, restricted as it now is.” Lord Cranworth, however, with the late Lord Justice Knight-Bruce and Lord Romilly, appear to have approved the common law rule.

Certainly the common law rule affords the honest practice, and the late Act was intended to establish it in equity as well as at law. Unfortunately, however, as too often happens, the language of the Act is not free from vagueness—and thus arose the question in the present case. In Gilliatt v. Gilliatt the conditions of sale stated that it would be subject to a reserved price, but were silent as to bidding. A puffer was employed who made several bids, the last being the bid immediately preceding the final bidding of the purchaser, who bought at the reserved price. The Master of the Rolls held him to his purchase; and the effect of the decision is, that in order to legalise the employment of a puffer, the conditions must state the reservation of a right to bid, as well as the fact of there being a reserved price. Certainly the employment of the word “or” in section 5 was extremely ambiguous; but, having regard to the object of the Act, as evidenced by the whole of its provisions, his Lordship ruled that its requirements were cumulative.

There may be a possible doubt as to the meaning of section 6. That section enacts that—

“Where any sale by auction is declared, either in the particulars or conditions of sale, to be subject to a right for the seller to bid, it shall be lawful for the seller, or any one person on his behalf, to bid at such auction in such manner as he may think proper.”

Clearly, a vendor might under the old law have stipulated for liberty to employ more than one puffer, but section 6 contemplates the employment of one only. The case is not very likely to occur, but if conditions of sale should stipulate for leave to the vendor and his agents to bid, or by some other phrase make it clear that the plural number was intended, a question might arise as to the legality of the practice. The Act certainly does not in terms forbid it, though it is evidently opposed to the general scope of section 6.

MORTGAGE OF A CALL ABOUT TO BE MADE—MORTGAGE OF ALL FUTURE CALLS.

Re Sankey Brook Company, V.O.J., 18 W. R. 427.

The uncalled capital of a company may be said to exist potentially, but has no actual existence unless in the pockets of the shareholders. The power of the directors to make calls is in no sense property. A call when made is a debt due to the company making it, and is thus a part of their property, an equitable asset. This was the ratio decidendi in the leading case of King v. Marshall (12 W. R. 971), where debentures issued by a company which was incorporated under the Act of 1856, and expressed to be a charge upon all the estate of the company, and all their undertaking, were held not to extend to calls in arrear or capital not called up. In Ex parte Stanley (12 W. R. 894), where the directors of a company were empowered to borrow on the security of the funds and property of the company, the Court of appeal decided that upon the true construction of the deed of settlement, the subscribed capital not paid up did not constitute "funds and property of the company" within the meaning of the deed; such a construction being, in the opinion of the Court, inconsistent with the further exercise by the directors of their discretion on the question whether calls ought or ought not to be made.

Future calls, therefore, cannot be assigned by way of mortgage, not only because the subject is non-existent, but also because the assignment, if capable of being made, would divest the directors of their discretion as to the making of calls. Arrears of a call may be lawfully assigned. So, too, may the proceeds of a call made but not payable, because a call is due, and is therefore an asset of the company from the time when it is made, though a future day for payment may be fixed out of consideration for those who are to pay it, and as limiting a time within which actions for recovery of the calls may not be commenced. Re Sankey Brook Company adds this point, that a debt may be lawfully contracted on the security of a particular call to be made forthwith. The undertaking by the directors to make that call was of the essence of this case, and the principle that future calls generally may not be lawfully pledged, appears to us to be in no way impeached by this decision.

MARRIED WOMAN'S SEPARATE PROPERTY IN HUSBAND'S REPUTED OWNERSHIP.

Ashton v. Blackshaw, V.C.M., 18 W. R. 307.

The policy of the Bills of Sale Registration Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36) is to render necessary registration in every case where the giver of the bill of sale continues in apparent possession of the goods comprised in the schedule. In Ashton v. Blackshaw a man, for valuable consideration, assigned his furniture to a third person in trust for his wife. The furniture was not delivered to the trustee, but continued in the joint possession of the husband and wife, or more correctly speaking, in the apparent possession of the husband, until he was adjudicated bankrupt. The assignee in bankruptcy claimed the furniture comprised in the bill of sale, which had never been registered, under the order and disposition clause, and the Court held that, owing to the omission to register the bill of sale, the claim must be sustained. Post-nuptial settlements, it will be remembered, are not within the exception of marriage settlements provided by section 7 of the Act, and require to be registered, where the subject-matter is that to which the Act applies (Fowler v. Foster, 5 Jur. N. S. 99). The statute does not narrow the application of the doctrine of reputed ownership (Stansfield v. Cubitt, 6 W. R. 320). The husband was still in apparent possession of the furniture—i.e., there was nothing to show the assignee that the property was not still going along with the possession. If registered, the bill of sale would have been good against the assignee in bankruptcy; but as it was not registered it was void according to the Act.

COMMON LAW.

EXECUTOR DE SON TORT—AGENT—PROBATE.

Sykes v. Sykes, C.P., 18 W. R. 551.

The meaning of the expression "executor de son tort," and the liability to be treated as an executor de son tort, were a good deal discussed in this case. The point decided was, that the agent of an executor named in a will cannot be treated as an executor de son tort merely because he deals as such agent with the goods of the deceased before the will is proved.

An executor de son tort is defined to be, "one who takes upon himself the office of executor by intrusion, not being so constituted by the deceased, nor, for want of such constitution, substituted by the Ecclesiastical Court to administer" (Williams on Executors, 6th ed. vol. 1, p. 247 n.). One who thus becomes executor de son tort is liable to be sued as if a regularly appointed executor by creditors or legatees of the deceased. He is not, however, if he plead properly, liable beyond the extent of the assets received, but to that extent he is liable. An executor de son tort is a wrongdoer. By dealing with goods which do not belong to him he becomes a trespasser, and may be held liable for such trespasses at the suit of the rightful executor who afterwards proves the will. Until the will is proved there is no one who can sue him for such trespass, and he is therefore held liable to creditors and legatees as if he were an executor. When the will is proved or administration granted, and some one not being the executor or administrator then intermeddles with the goods, this does not (with perhaps the exception of the case where he claims the goods as executor) make him an executor de son tort, because there is another personal representative of right against whom creditors can bring their actions.

Not only may a stranger who intermeddles without authority with the goods of a testator be treated in some respects as if he was a duly appointed executor, but an executor duly named in a will who deals with a testator's goods before probate may also be treated as if he had obtained probate; that is, he may be sued as executor for the debts of the deceased. In one case (Webster v. Webster, 10 Ves. 93) it was said that such an executor was an executor de son tort. In another case (Sharland v. Mildon, 5 Hare, 469, 15 L. J. Ch. 434) it was held that the agent of a testator's widow might be sued as an executor de son tort after he had, as such agent, intermeddled with the testator's goods; but it does not clearly appear from the reports of that case whether or not the widow was appointed executrix. The point in issue in Sykes v. Sykes was whether an agent of a rightful executor may be treated before probate as an executor de son tort if he deal with the testator's goods. The argument in favour of the affirmative of this proposition was chiefly based on these two cases.

The decision in Sykes v. Sykes is, that a duly appointed executor who has not proved the will may indeed be sued as executor if he intermeddles with the property of the deceased, because, in the words of M. Smith, J., "he is estopped from denying that he is executor, and I should say that a more proper term to use than executor de son tort in that case would be executor by estoppel." Such an executor cannot, however, be an executor de son tort in the sense in which that expression is applied to strangers who intermeddle, because an executor is entitled before probate to do almost any act incident to his office. The probate is evidence of his title, but not its source, which is the appointment by the testator. It is clear therefore that executor by estoppel is a far more accurate description in such a case than executor de son tort. It follows from this principle that as a duly appointed executor does not become a wrongdoer by intermeddling with the testator's goods, his agent in dealing with the goods cannot be a wrongdoer, and this was the actual point in dispute in Sykes v. Sykes.

The decision in Sykes v. Sykes shows that the expression in Webster v. Webster, that an executor intermeddling before probate is an executor de son tort, is not strictly accurate; and further, that if the widow in Sharland v. Mildon was executrix, that that decision will not be followed. If she was not executrix, Sykes v. Sykes is quite consistent with Sharland v. Mildon.

We believe that as a matter of fact it was ascertained that in Sharland v. Mildon the widow was not the executrix, therefore there is no real conflict between the two decisions.

REVIEWS.

Essays on the Form of the Law. By THOMAS ERSKINE HOLLAND, M.A., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, and of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law. London: Butterworths.

On the theoretical imperfection of the mode in which statute law in this country is promulgated, it is hardly necessary for us to enlarge. To suggest some radical changes in this respect is the object of Mr. Holland's work. The work is divided into two parts: the first part having reference to the law generally, and the second part dealing specially with the statutes. The views which the writer advocates are summarised in pp. 4—6. The principal of these are as follows:—That the amendment of the form of the law of England is a more pressing necessity than that of the matter; that the formal amendment should be conducted independently of material changes; that the end to be aimed at is a code which should contain but one system of law, so that no attempt should be made in a code of the law of England to exhibit incongruous laws which prevail in other portions of the British Empire; that when the code, or (as a step towards it) the digest, is completed, all subsequent legislation should have reference to some specific title of the code or digest.

Before proceeding to consider Mr. Holland's method for the classification of the statutes, we may observe that he adopts Blackstone's and not Austin's notion of a law proper. According to Austin, it is the office of laws to enjoin acts or forbearances of a class, as opposed to acts determined specifically. According to Blackstone, it is the office of laws to oblige generally the members of a given community, and not particular persons determined individually.

From the series of English statutes Mr. Holland would reject (1) statutes which have no reference to England; (2) statutes which merely keep in motion the machinery of Government; (3) statutes which affect only certain localities or certain individuals in England (pp. 108—110); the two last of these classes being excluded from the "public general" Acts altogether (p. 146). The "public general" Acts should, according to Mr. Holland (p. 147) be split up into four separately numbered series—(1) English; (2) Scotch; (3) Irish; (4) those relating to the Colonies or India. And Mr. Holland says (p. 173) in answer to our remarks last year upon this subject,—"You suggest that, upon my principles, the English statutes should again be broken up into a 'common law' and 'equity' series. But surely, because I wish to subdivide, I am not obliged to subdivide ad infinitum. If equity and common law were distinct bodies of law, I would certainly propose to have a body of equitable and common law statutes; but, fortunately, we are not quite in such evil case as this. This objection, if it is seriously urged, is, however, answered by what I say as to digesting the body of statute law as soon as we have ascertained what laws they are which we wish to digest."

We are not sure that Mr. Holland has quite understood us. We did not, of course, mean to imply that one subdivision necessarily implies another; but what we meant was this, that whatever subdivision you propose to adopt, you must show its reasonableness and convenience. Until you have done this, one kind of subdivision stands on the same footing as another. The question then arises, is it, on the whole, convenient or otherwise that the English law should be dealt with separately from the law of Scotland or that of any other portion of the empire? Mr. Holland's answer would be in the affirmative, on the ground that the English legal system is a distinct legal system in itself. But we are not at all disposed to admit that the English system is, in all respects, a distinct legal system in itself. On some subjects the law is the same for the whole of the United Kingdom, e.g., treason; trade and commerce (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97); and joint stock companies (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89). And this class of subjects is likely rather to be extended than narrowed by future legislation. For instance, the commissioners appointed to inquire into the law of marriage have recommended a uniform marriage law for the whole of the United Kingdom. According to the present practice, legislative provisions having reference to the whole of the United Kingdom simply appear once in the statute book: whereas, according to Mr. Holland's plan, they would be repeated three times over, and thus, pro tanto, aggravate the prolixity of the entire statute book. In de-eiding, then, upon the proper arrangement of the law, it is of course impossible to lose sight of the matter of the law; and, as a corollary, it is impossible to settle the proper form which the law should assume, independently of the material changes which may have been effected, or may be in prospect. But, assuming that the English and Scottish systems were wholly distinct, we are not prepared to admit that a complete separation of the laws applicable to either country would be desirable. To the student of comparative jurisprudence such a separation would be a distinct loss. But then it is said that the English lawyer would be thereby enabled to disencumber himself of a mass of legislative matter with which he would, in practice, have nothing to do. But to this it may be answered (1) that the convenience of the English lawyer may be met by a proper arrangement of the Statutes under the direction of the Council for Law Reporting. Editions of the Statutes are published every year under the sanction of that council, for the convenience of English lawyers; assuming, therefore, the arrangement suggested by Mr. Holland to be the most convenient for English lawyers, it is for the Council of Law Reporting and not for the Legislature to carry it into effect. Thus, in the reports of the appeal cases before the House of Lords, English and Irish cases are published separately from Scotch and divorce cases, because it is conceived that the division in question is most likely to render the reports useful to the profession. But (2), even as regards English lawyers, questions of Scotch law do sometimes come before the courts in England. In the case, for instance, of Dutton v. Halley, in the Queen's Bench, reported 2 B. & S. 748, the question was as to the construction of a clause in the Scotch Bankruptcy Act of 1856. It may be said that such cases are exceptions, and therefore no objection to the general scheme proposed. But we think that such an argument, if admitted, would apply in a similar way to the illustrations given by Mr. Holland of the inconveniences of the existing system (pp. 153—158).

What we have said with regard to Scotland applies a fortiori to the case of Ireland, seeing that the legal system of Ireland has far more in common with England than has that of Scotland.

We have thought it best to dwell principally upon the point (and a very important one it is) upon which we are at issue with Mr. Holland. It must not, however, be inferred that we do not, in general, concur with the scheme he proposes. It would be necessary to observe great caution in carrying it out. Space forbids us to add more, except to acknowledge the great ability displayed by Mr. Holland in dealing with his subject, and the admirably clear language in which his book is written.

COURTS.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

May 9.—Re Wooler.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125 and 126 (cl. 6).—Third special meeting of creditors.

Read applied that the Court would give directions to the registrar to send notices of the holding of a third special meeting of creditors under the petition filed by the debtor, in order to confirm a resolution which had previously been passed by creditors assembled at a second meeting.

It appeared that at the first meeting of creditors a resolution was passed to accept a composition of five shillings in the pound. At the second meeting, instead of confirming that resolution, the creditors passed an extraordinary resolution to accept seven shillings and sixpence in the pound; and the question arose whether, under the 126th section, the creditors had power to pass an extraordinary resolution instead of confirming the one originally passed. It was contended that clause 6 of that section contemplated the addition to or variance of any resolution previously passed, but that did not appear to be provided for by the 282nd rule, and that all the creditors could do was to confirm the original resolution.

The CHIEF JUDGE was of opinion that the creditors were entitled at the second meeting to pass the extraordinary resolution referred to, and directed the registrar to give notice of another meeting at which to confirm it.

Solicitor, Jennings.

May 10.—Re Rosa.Solicitor's bill of costs.

The debtor in September, 1869, registered a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors. It appeared that previously to the registration of the deed, Mr. Woodard, solicitor, had acted professionally for the debtor, but his bill of costs had not been delivered, and the debtor estimated the amount at £20 as security for his claim. Mr. Woodard held several documents and papers belonging to the debtor. The trustees under the deed soon after their appointment called upon Mr. Woodard to deliver his bill of costs in order that they might satisfy the amount of it, and obtain the documents in his possession belonging to the debtor, but Mr. Woodard did not accede to this requisition. Thereupon summonses were issued for the examination of Mr. Woodard, and at the last examination, an order was made by the registrar requiring Mr. Woodard to show cause before him why he should not deliver to the said trustees his said bill of costs, and pay the costs of and occasioned by the several applications therein.

Mr. Woodard now appeared in person to show cause. He contended that the proper course for the trustees to adopt was to take out a summons at judges' chambers, and that this Court had no jurisdiction to compel him to deliver his bill.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that the duty of Mr. Woodard as a solicitor of the court was very plain; he was bound to deliver his bill of costs, and he must do so within ten days. The question of costs would be reserved.

(Before the Hon. W. C. SPRING-RICE, Registrar.)

May 17.—Re Dedman.Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 17 & 28—First meeting of creditors—Composition.

Mr. J. S. Salaman, solicitor for the petitioning creditor and a large majority of the trade creditors, applied under the 28th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, that the registrar might be directed to summon a special meeting of creditors to consider a proposal made by the bankrupt.

It seemed that the adjudication had been obtained some few days ago on the petition of creditors. The bankrupt had since offered a composition, which the creditors were willing to accept, but, inasmuch as the first meeting of creditors had not yet taken place, a doubt had arisen whether the proposal could be carried out before the appointment of a trustee. In support of the application it was contended that the registrar had power to hold the meeting without any unnecessary delay, and reference was made to section 17, which defined the word "trustee" to mean the trustee for the time being, including the "registrar" acting in the bankruptcy.

The REGISTRAR said it was impossible that anything could be done until after the appointment of a trustee, but, in order that no unnecessary delay should take place, notice might be given that at the meeting a special resolution would be submitted to the creditors. It was requisite, however, that an affidavit should be filed setting forth the grounds of the application, and the circumstances under which it was made.

COUNTY COURTS.

LAMBETH.

(Before R. J. CURR, Esq., Deputy Judge.)

April 12.—Evans v. Proom.Lessor and Lessee—Dilapidations—Expiration of Term—Right to sue.

The facts of this case will be gathered from the following judgment:—

MR. CURR.—This action is brought to recover damages for breach of an agreement, not under seal, dated October 12, 1866, whereby, in consideration of £50, the plaintiff agreed to let to the defendant a house in the parish of St. Mary Newington from the 14th June, 1867, for two years at a peppercorn rent, and the defendant agreed "to repair the premises as often as occasion should require and to yield up the same in good repair at the end or other sooner determination of the said term." The defendant entered into possession and remained until the 14th June, 1869, when the premises were shown to be in a very dilapidated condition. It however, appeared incidentally, on cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, that the premises were not given up to the plaintiff, but, by her consent, to the governors and guardians of the poor of the parish as the freeholders, and it was not denied that the governors were the real plaintiffs. The defendant contended that the plaintiff had ceased to have any interest in the premises, and that she was not liable to the present owners in regard to the non-repairs, and that the plaintiff having suffered no loss could recover no damages.

I think these objections are not an answer to the action. There is no evidence to show that the interest of the plaintiff was not subsisting when the defendant's term expired. The defendant, as lessee, cannot dispute the title of his lessor, and there is no evidence inconsistent with the continuance of the plaintiff's interest subsequent to the expiration of the lease. The defendant never attorned to, or paid rent to anyone but the plaintiff. That he gave possession to the present owners is quite consistent with the existence of an agreement between them and the plaintiff, having reference to some subsequent arrangement. Even if the plaintiff's interest had determined during the defendant's term, that would not have affected the question. Such a determination must have occurred in one of two ways—either by the cessation of the plaintiff's interest in toto, as in the case of a limited interest, or by its transfer to another party. Clew v. Brogden (2 Man. & Gr. 39) decides that the cessation of a lessee's interest by the forfeiture of his term, cannot be pleaded to an action by the lessor for dilapidations, and Bickford v. Parsons, (9 C. B. 920), which was relied on for the plaintiff, shows that where the lease is not under seal, and consequently the right to sue does not pass to the assignee under the statute 3 Hen. 8, c. 34, that right remains in the lessor and may be exercised for his own benefit. It is immaterial to the defendant who reaps the benefit of the agreement provided he is liable only to one person. He is not concerned to inquire into the title of his lessor, nor is he damaged if at the end of the tenancy he is directed by his lessor to give up possession to a stranger. The suggestion that the action is brought for the benefit of the present owners, although not in their names, is not material to the issue. The only question on this part of the case is whether the defendant is liable to the present plaintiff. I am of opinion that he is.

The remaining question is the amount of damages. There was no evidence as to the condition of the premises at the commencement of the defendant's term, but it must be presumed that they were tenantable from the fact of his entering into the agreement to keep and yield them up in repair, and even if it could be shown that this was not the case, the defendant would not be relieved from his liability; for, as Baron Parke observed in Payne v. Haine (16 M. & W. 545), "the lessee could not keep and yield them up in good repair without first putting them into it." The amount claimed by the plaintiff is shown to be a fair estimate, and there will be judgment for the plaintiff for that amount.

LAMBETH.

(Before J. PITT TAYLOR, Esq., Judge.)

May 17.—Dover v. Reed.

A novel point of county court practice was raised in this case. The action was in replevin, and it appeared that the defendant had seized the goods of the plaintiff for rent, and the plaintiff, with two other persons, registered a bond at the county court as security that he should bring his action against the defendant within a month, and prosecute such action with "diligence and effect." The action was duly brought; but on the day of hearing the plaintiff's solicitor appeared and said, his client and witnesses not having arrived, he could not get on. After standing over some time for the appearance of the plaintiff, who did not arrive, the cause was struck out, and the defendant was allowed his costs.

Mr. Ody applied to have the cause restored, or to have a rule nisi calling upon the defendant to show cause why it should not be restored, and a day fixed for hearing.

MR. PITT TAYLOR pointed out that a new summons might issue.

Mr. Ody said that would not meet the case. The plaintiff, with his co-bondsmen, had forfeited £30, the amount of the bond, if the original summons could not be heard; because the month allowed for bringing the action had expired, and, in fact, the defendant had already commenced an action on the bond in one of the superior courts.

Mr. PITT TAYLOR said, as far as he could learn, the point was without precedent, and he must decline to give an opinion off-hand. He, however, granted a rule nisi calling on the other side to show cause why a day should not be fixed for hearing the original summons, and thus save the plaintiff from having to issue a new summons, as well as save him and his co-bondmen from liability under the bond. If the plaintiff had a good case it was rather hard that he should be mulcted in £30 through having mistaken the day of hearing. It was quite clear he would be so mulcted if the case could not be restored.

The 31st of May was then fixed for arguing the rule.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. JAMES EDWARD DAVIS, barrister-at-law, and stipendiary magistrate of the Potteries district, has been appointed first Stipendiary Magistrate of Sheffield, the salary of which office has been fixed by the Town Council of that borough at £1,000 per annum. Mr. Davis was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in November, 1842, shortly after which he joined the Oxford Circuit, attending also the Shropshire and Staffordshire Sessions. During this period he often acted as Deputy Judge of the Warwickshire County Court. He is the author of a very good work on County Court Practice, and had been stipendiary magistrate of the Potteries district since June, 1864.

Mr. THOMAS LAXTON, solicitor, of Stamford, Lincolnshire, has been appointed Clerk to the Stamford Board of Guardians, in succession to the late Mr. Alderman Clapton.

Mr. JAMES F. NOLAN has been appointed by the Colonial Government to the office of Judge of the County Court, Melbourne. Mr. Nolan was called to the Irish Bar in Easter Term, 1855, and shortly after commenced practice at the Melbourne Bar.

Mr. CHARLES SANDERSON, solicitor, has been appointed Registrar of the Archdeaconry of Calcutta, from April 16, in succession to Mr. H. R. Delves Broughton, barrister-at-law, who resigned on being appointed Administrator-General of Bengal. Mr. Sanderson was admitted at Westminster in Hilary Term, 1851, and is a member of the firm of Berners, Sanderson & Upton, solicitors, Calcutta.

Mr. WILLIAM JOHN SLADE FOSTER, solicitor, of Wells, Somersetshire, and Town Clerk of that borough, has been appointed Registrar of the Wells County Court, in the place of Mr. Edwin Lovell, resigned.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

A GRIEVANCE.

Sir,—When lawyers in either branch of the profession think it consistent with their dignity and duty to write to the public papers respecting cases in which they have been concerned, they ought, at least, to take care that they do not allow their private feelings to distort or colour, even unconsciously, their account of the facts of which they think it right to complain. My attention has been called to the following paragraph, which appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette a few days ago:—

"One of the points which Chief Justice Cockburn emphasises in his letter to the Lord Chancellor on law reform is that some limit should be put upon the right of appeal to a series of courts and especially to the House of Lords. The unanimity of the judges in the court below ought, he thinks, to be a bar to carrying the suit to the supreme tribunal. The necessity for some rule of this kind is strongly illustrated in a case which 'A Barrister' describes in a letter to the Times. Three years ago he was counsel for the plaintiff in an action for false imprisonment brought by a poor man against a rich man, a magistrate and a barrister. The plaintiff had a verdict for £100. The defendant moved for a new trial; rule refused. He appealed to the Exchequer Chamber; judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant then took the case to the House of Lords, when the decisions of the Exchequer Chamber, the Court of Exchequer, and the Lord Chief Baron, who tried the cause, were overruled by the Lord Chancellor, two ex-Chancellors, and a Scotch judge. The costs were enormous."

I have referred to the letter in question and find that it is fairly represented by the Pall Mall Gazette. Now, the obvious inference from the notice, which is made even stronger by the terms of the letter itself, is that the unanimous opinion of the Exchequer Chamber, the Court of Exchequer, and the Lord Chief Baron (i.e., practically of the whole Common Law Bench) was overruled by three equity lawyers and a Scotch judge. If this be not meant the letter is mere peevish complaint, and the writer in the Pall Mall Gazette has been betrayed into an absurdity, for as Lord Chief Justice Cockburn's observation only applies to a case where the Court below was unanimous, the case in question is not in point if that Court was divided in opinion.

Now the case referred to by "A Barrister" (I purposely refrain from giving his name) is quite obviously Perryman the Younger v. Lister, and your readers will perhaps be astonished to learn that the Court of Exchequer was equally divided on the point, Bramwell and Pigott, BB., being for the defendant (who ultimately succeeded in the Lords) and Kelly, C.B., supporting his own ruling at Nisi Prius, with the assistance of Channell, B. The Court of Exchequer Chamber pronounced a unanimous judgment, but it was known to be the result of a compromise, and that in fact, on the point ultimately decided (which the Exchequer Chamber refused to decide), the judges present were as two to three. Further, "A Barrister" must have known that when an application to extend the time for giving notice of appeal to the Lords was made in chambers, Willes, J., expressed his willingness to do anything in his power to enable the defendant to get rid of "so monstrous a decision." Lastly, why was it not disclosed that one of the law lords (who were unanimous in favour of the appellant) was Lord Chelmsford, who cannot be supposed to be a mere equity lawyer? Had the whole truth been told it would have appeared that the unanimous decision of Lords Hatherley, Chelmsford, Westbury and Colonsay was in accordance with the views expressed by Willes, Byles, and (I believe) Lush, JJ., and Bramwell and Pigott, BB., in opposition to those of Kelly, C.B., Channell, B., and Blackburn, Keating, and M. Smith, JJ. That being so, I think no one will be likely to believe that "A Barrister's" client has any real reason to complain of the result of his action.

REPAIRING FENCES.

Sir,—Can any of your readers refer me to a case bearing on the following:—

A. occupies a piece of land, the property of C., as a garden, separated from a highway by a small field belonging to and occupied by B.; the hedges next the highway and also next A.'s garden belong to B. Owing to these hedges being out of repair cattle stray off the highway over B.'s land on to A.'s garden in the night, and are removed before A. is aware of the damage. Can A. recover against B. for the damage?

ANIMALS.

Will any reader be so kind as to refer me to any cases upon the question of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of A. killing an animal the property of B.—for instance, a cat, the cat at the time being found destroying the fowls of A.?

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1861—JUDGMENT CREDITOR—COSTS.

I shall be obliged by an answer to the following from one of your correspondents:—

Can a judgment creditor include in his claim against the estate of his debtor, the costs of an execution rendered abortive by the debtor having executed an assignment under the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, which was registered whilst the sheriff was in possession? The deed was executed after service of the writ, but before judgment signed.

On interpleader the sheriff was ordered to withdraw, the deed having been registered.

A COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER.

TITLE TO PROPERTY HELD FOR RELIGIOUS OR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES.

Sir,—Will one of your readers kindly give me his opinion on the following:—

By 13 & 14 Vict. c. 28, property conveyed for religious or educational purposes is to vest in successors, without conveyance, by the adoption of the memorandum of the choice and appointment of new trustees mentioned in the schedule. The Act directs the appointment of new trustees to be made to appear by deed.

Ought the memorandum to bear a 35s. deed stamp, or would the statute be satisfied by the memorandum being written on plain paper under the hand and seal of the chairman?

■ And is enrolment necessary?

A COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER.

Sir,—May I, at the risk of again exposing my ignorance of the value of time, reply briefly to "A Solicitor's" last letter? I regret that he should look upon my "very simple remedy" as being worse than the disease. At the same time he must be aware that it is one which not a few of his professional brethren have adopted and have found to be attended with most beneficial results. His antipathy to compulsory dinners I can understand, but confess my inability to follow him when he argues that because, during the term of probation he would not be permitted to practise as an attorney, he must necessarily waste the three years in "disgraceful sloth."

That, however, is not the issue here. My excuse for trespassing on your space is that "A Solicitor" has failed, in my opinion, to see the real point of Scott v. Stansfeld, which he is good enough to admit "must be held to be the law until revised." The principle which underlies the decision of the judges in that case and which was explicitly recognised in their language, is neither novel nor "contrary to the spirit of the English law." The mischievous consequences that would inevitably result if a judge of a court of record were liable in damages for language used by him in respect of matters judicially before him and in discharge of his functions as judge, are so palpably obvious that it is difficult to conceive how the court, looking above all thing to the maintenance of judicial independence, could have held otherwise than they did. If "A Solicitor" will refer to the case again. I think he will admit that it does "apply to attorneys having the conduct of a cause" just as much as to the parties themselves. But, as Baron Channell took occasion to observe at the time, it does not follow that a county court judge can so misconduct himself with impunity. The remedy lies, not in an action for slander, but in an appeal to the Lord Chancellor, who has the power to remove from his office a judge by whom that office is abused.

When it is found that such an appeal is made in vain, the interference of the Legislature may be necessary.

A BARRISTER.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

May 13.—Hawkers and Pedlars.—The Earl of Airlie asked if the Government would introduce a measure for the better regulation of the trade of travelling hawkers and pedlars. There was a strong prima facie case against a tax which pressed with great severity on a class mostly poor, and whose customers also were mostly poor. A licence was no guarantee for the respectability of its holder; indeed, the present system tended rather to hinder the operations of the police, for an apparently suspicious character had only to produce a licence, and the policeman could say nothing more to him. There was urgent necessity for some supervision over this class. A system of registration would much more effectually check existing evils, and would possibly in time introduce a much more respectable class of men.—The Earl of Morley said the Government were fully sensible of the necessity, in the event of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal being carried out, of introducing new regulations, and a bill would, in all probability, be brought in this session.

The Ecclesiastical Patronage Transfer Bill was read a third time and passed.

May 16.—The Compulsory Education Bill, by Lord Stratheden, was read a first time.

The Ritual Commission Report.—In reply to Earl Russell, Earl Granville said this report would soon be ready.

Churchwardens' Liabilities.—A bill by the Marquis of Salisbury to relieve churchwardens of their liability for certain charges formerly defrayed out of church-rates, was read a first time.

May 17.—The Sequestration Bill.—The Bishop of Winchester moved the second reading. Benefices were endowments charged with important spiritual duties, and the endowments were not the private property of the incumbent, but a trust held upon the continual discharge of those duties. It was not right that a temporary holder, if through his own carelessness he became unable to discharge them, should be able to divert the endowment from the parish, and thus prevent the appointment of a worthier successor. That a clergyman should be able to run in debt, giving his creditors the security of the endowment which belonged to the parish, was so utterly wrong in theory that it demanded an immediate and stringent remedy. The bill proposed that any clergyman who should become bankrupt, and be unable to obtain a certificate from the Bankruptcy Court, should, at the discretion of the bishop or archbishop, forfeit his benefice. And it was proposed, as had been done in all bills of this kind, to give discretionary power as to the time and mode of enforcing such deprivation to the bishop, with an appeal to the archbishop of the province: for there might be cases of unforeseen misfortune, in which the incumbent ought to have time to recover himself. The Marquis of Harrowby had brought in another bill on the same subject, which, it seemed to him, would actually increase the evil of sequestrations, and not one of its chief provisions would be workable. It provided that a clergyman who should not within a certain time pay his debts should be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, whereas his bill proposed to go through the stages of a debtor summons and petition in bankruptcy, thus giving the clergyman and his friends an opportunity of meeting the emergency. Lord Harrowby's bill provided that the bishop should ascertain the whole amount of the debt of the sequestered clergyman, throwing on him the responsibility of finding the right amount, a task which ought not to be thrown on a bishop. Then he was to apply to Queen Anne's Bounty for a sum sufficient to pay off the whole amount, and the life of the incumbent was to be insured for the sum so borrowed, in order that it might be repaid at his death. Queen Anne's Bounty would not grant money on such a security for many of the lives would not be insurable at all. The bishop would first have to create an insurance company which would take the life. And if the clergyman committed suicide, the policy might be forfeited. Again, another clause provided for the payment of arrears on the policy, whereas, if the payments were allowed to fall into arrear, the policy would lapse. This was an illustration of the accuracy pervading Lord Harrowby's bill. It proposed again, that the bishop should consider all the claims, and settle the order and proportion of payment, matters quite alien to the education of a bishop, and for which no bishop would willingly become responsible, since he would have no hope of doing justice in the case. After all this cumbrous machinery, moreover, no benefit was secured to the parishioners, for the living was still liable to sequestration for the purpose of meeting the claims of creditors, insurance charges, and so on.—Lord Cairns said all would agree as to the great misfortune which befell any parish where the incumbent fell into pecuniary difficulties, and where, above all under the process of sequestration, its spiritual duties were very imperfectly performed. The title of the bill was misleading; its title was "An Act to avoid sequestration, and to provide a more effectual remedy for securing the payment of the debts of beneficed clerks," and the same object was expressed in the preamble, yet the bill not only made no new provision for securing payment, but abolished the only means by which, in nine cases out of ten, payment could be secured. Its principle was that for the future a freehold benefice was to be absolutely forfeited, subject to the discretion of the bishop, if the holder, from misfortune or any other cause, fell into bankruptcy. Even if that were the best possible rule for the future, Parliament could not apply it to existing holders. They entered on their benefices under certain conditions, and it would be hard if they were made liable to forfeiture by a process at present unknown to the law. Was Parliament prepared to say that, for the future, if the holder of any freehold office to which the performance of certain duties is attached became bankrupt, the office should be forfeited? If the principle was right it could not be confined to clergymen, but must be applied to freehold offices. It had been said the endowment was not the property of the holder, but of the parish, but it was the services of the incumbent which belonged to the parish, and provided they were rendered in a proper way the expenditure of his income was his own affair, and not that of the parish. The right of the parishioners could not go beyond the right to the proper performance of the duties. The bill left to the discretion of the bishop, subject to appeal to the archbishop, the question whether the benefice should be forfeited or not, in the event of bankruptcy. Was the bishop or the archbishop to sit as a kind of bankruptcy judge to consider the circumstances which had led the bankrupt clergyman into embarrassment, and to pass an opinion on his conduct? Would Parliament place such power even in such good hands? If, too, the bishop decided that the benefice was not to be forfeited, what was to be done with the creditors? Was the clergyman to retain his benefice without paying them? The bill made no provision for the creditors in case the living was not forfeited. It proceeded on the principle that unless the bankrupt obtained his discharge the benefice was to be forfeited, but it was well-known that a common condition of discharge was for a certain portion of the income or salary to be dedicated to the purpose of paying the debts. The bankruptcy judge, therefore, would have power to discharge the bankrupt on such a condition, and the fact of discharge would entitle the bankrupt to retain possession of his benefice, yet, as at present with sequestrations, a portion of the income would be diverted to the payment of his creditors. The bill was passed as a merciful one to the clergy, because money-lenders and others were now induced to lend them money, knowing that when the pinch came they could obtain a sequestration, and it was said that if the clergy were not to be trusted in this way their condition would be much better. The consequence would be persons would be quite as willing to lend money as now, but the risk would be greater, and the terms therefore harder. The defect of the existing law was that the bishop, in the event of sequestration and failure of the clergyman to perform his duties, was not allowed to reserve a sufficient portion of the income to meet the wants of the parish. Any bill in that direction would be accepted by Parliament, and would remedy the evil so far as it admitted of remedy, for it could not be remedied entirely.—The Archbishop of York said the real question was this:—The law at present regarded a benefice in the light of a freehold possession, and the House was asked to treat it in future as a trust, and to take care, first of all, that its duties were duly discharged. Lord Cairns said it ought not to be applied to existing incumbents. It would not be fair to apply it to existing debts, but why should it not be applied to all debts contracted thereafter? Lord Cairns contended that if the duties of a freehold office were discharged that was enough, but there was a great difference between the position of a clergyman in difficulties and that of the holders of other offices. An officer in the army could not place himself in the position at present open to clergymen. He would lose his commission by committing acts such as those by which too frequently a clergyman loses the confidence of his parishioners. Consuls and persons in other public offices were also unable to charge their incomes with the payment of their debts. True, those were not freehold offices. There was that distinction, but in point of principle, if such persons sometimes lost their offices for these acts, why should a clergyman who could no longer be of the slightest use to his parishioners be treated differently? Lord Cairns said the proper remedy was to provide a sufficient allowance for the performance of the duties. It would be all very well if a sufficient allowance for the appointment of another clergyman could be obtained, the former incumbent going into retirement with a portion of the income, but in nine cases out ten the benefices were too small. He hoped their lordships would affirm the principle of the bill. He understood that there would be no objection to referring it to a select committee.—The Earl of Harrowby did not pretend that his bill was entirely satisfactory, but he hoped their lordships would refer it likewise to a select committee.—The Duke of Cleveland held that an amendment of the law was urgently called for.—Lord Westbury said that since the Irish Church Bill he had seen none which was a greater violation of the rights of property. With one fell swoop it would take away their property, not only from the clergy, but from their creditors, and would place it at the disposal of the bishop or archbishop. Such a scheme it was hardly possible for any reasonable being to entertain. The principles enunciated in the speech of the Bishop of Winchester were founded on reason and justice, and if the bill went to a select committee, on which he, for one, should be happy to serve, its efforts would be directed to bringing the bill into harmony with those principles. The law had provided the clergyman with that income to the intent that he might fully discharge its clerical and parochial duties, and if he was unable to do so, reason and justice demanded that his superior, the bishop, should be able to take so much of the income as was required for those duties. No doubt, in many cases the whole income might be inadequate to that purpose, but to the extent of that principle he should be most willing to go, and the present law undoubtedly fell far short of its duty in the administration of that principle.—The Marquis of Salisbury supported the bill on the ground that the income enjoyed by the clergyman belonged really to the parishioner.—The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol recognised several defects in the bill, but it was with the greatest satisfaction that he saw the principle enunciated that livings were held in trust.—The Lord Chancellor enumerated many instances which had come before him personally during office, in which parishes had been for many years in the greatest disorder, owing to the incumbent being absent from his duties in consequence of his debts. Was it to be supposed that a clergyman could teach to his parishioners the cardinal principle of doing as they would be done by, if he exhibited in his own person an example of spending carelessly the money of other people by taking goods from his parishioners which he had no means of paying for, and if he thus neglected the obvious duties which all owed one to another. He then took objections to the machinery of the Earl of Harrowby's bill, and expressed a hope that the other bill would be sent to a select committee.—The Earl of Harrowby did not press his bill, and the Bishop of Winchester's bill was then read a second time and ordered to be referred to a select committee.

May 19.—The Ecclesiastical Titles Bill was read a first time.

The Marriage With a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill.—Lord Houghton moved the second reading.—The Duke of Marlborough supported the bill.—Lord Lansdowne did so on social grounds.—The Bishop of Ely opposed it on Scriptural grounds: it would only produce discomfort.—Lord Kimberley combatted the arguments used against the bill.—The Bishop of Ripon supported the bill; the Word of God not having forbidden the marriage, but tacitly permitting it.—The Bishop of Lincoln contended that Scripture forbade it.—Lord Westbury urged that the present law, as grounded in a misapprehension or delusion, should be expunged from the statute-book.—The Bishop of Peterborough censured Lord Westbury's levity, and regarded the bill as fraught with social evils.—Lord Lifford regarded the existing law as founded in an inconsistent and unfortunate legislation.—The Duke of Argyll opposed the bill, and was not convinced that the public generally supported it.—The Earl of Harrowby condemned it as opposed to the whole voice of Christendom.—The Lord Chancellor earnestly opposed the bill as wrong and as in conflict with the spirit of the nation.—Earl Granville supported it as wise, expedient, and just. On a division the bill was rejected by a majority of 76 to 74.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

May 13.—Habitual Criminals Act.—Mr. Rowland Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the Habitual Criminals Act of 1869, clause 16, the date 1861 was not inserted in error for 1866, and whether this error had not rendered the clause inoperative; and, if so, whether he would this session amend it.—Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen said that owing to the haste with which the Habitual Criminals Act was passed, many errors of omission and commission were allowed to pass in the bill. The Home Secretary, however, intended to introduce a bill during the present session to remedy these inaccuracies.

Police Regulation of Vagrants.—Dr. Brewer called attention to the unsatisfactory working of the regulations in force to secure the humane intentions of the Legislature in behalf of the homeless poor, consequent on the practically indiscriminate distribution of relief given to the whole class of applicants, criminal or not criminal, impostors or genuine poor, and moved that vagrants applying for shelter and food be put under the protection, regulation, and management of police. Reviewing the history of this subject, he said there was nothing new in the proposal to place this vagrant class under the supervision and regulation of the police, for that was the original and primal basis of the poor law institutions of the country. He then went into the statistics. Steps should be taken to separate the accidentally poor from the professional vagrant. The utter absence of all control, of all attempts at reclamation, and of all efforts to get at the children of these unhappy men and women, constituted a danger which local agency could not cope with. He moved:—"That vagrants applying for shelter and food shall be put under the protection, regulation, and management of the police."—Mr. Bromley-Davenport seconded the motion.—Mr. Corrance said the only remedy was strict supervision.—Mr. W. H. Smith recommended that vagrants be set to work as in the French Depots de mendicité.—Mr. Whalley said the Poor Law Board should forbid the guardians spending the rates on this class, and every man who could not give an account of himself should be locked up.—Mr. Walter feared such a sweeping plan would inflict hardship on the innocent, and urged the Poor Law Board to invent a plan for discriminating in the giving of relief.—Mr. Goschen said the Home Office and the Poor Law Board had seriously considered this matter, but they could do little to suppress vagrancy unless the public assisted them by refraining from giving indiscriminate alms. He suggested that the definition of "rogue and vagabond" should be extended, and that the guardians should have the power of detaining and putting to work habitual "casuals." This he preferred to transferring them to the police, which would be enormously expensive, and would not secure as much discrimination as the present system of relief, because the policeman, as a rule, was a much easier person to deal with than the relieving officer.—Sir M. Beach advocated uniformity of treatment, relief to be given to all who really needed it, a certain amount of work to be exacted for it, and putting the vagrants under the police. The magistrates ought to carry out the law more stringently.—The motion was withdrawn.

May 16.—The Irish Land Bill.—Committee. Part III. (Purchase by tenants; advances for that purpose.) Clause 39.—The Commissioners of Public Works were inserted as "the board" referred to.—In reply to Mr. Selater-Booth, Mr. Gladstone said the amount to be applied to these advances for purchases by tenants must be left to Parliament to determine. There was so much that was experimental in those provisions that it would be desirable at first to provide a moderate sum to meet any early demand that might arise, after which the matter could again be brought before Parliament, with improved means of forming a judgment upon it.—Clause 40 (Advances to landlords for improvements) was agreed to, an amendment by Mr. F. Heygate, to authorise advances for improvements to be made to tenants as well as to landlords, having been negatived.—Clause 41 (Advances to tenants desirous of purchasing). Mr. C. Fortescue moved to add after "the board" "if they are satisfied of the security."—Mr. Corrance criticised the scheme and its policy. The security would not be good to the State when it might to the ordinary lender; because the State, as a landlord, would not, from motives of policy, be able to deal with recalcitrant tenants. The scheme might be very well for Irish landlords who looked to it as a mode of spoiling the Egyptians; but applying to it the vulgar rules of pounds, shillings and pence, he could only regard it as a scheme vicious in principle, probably corrupt in practice, and certainly mischievous in its results.—Mr. Whalley entirely concurred.—The amendment was agreed to.—Mr. Selater-Booth proposed to limit the advance to one moiety of the price of the holding instead of three-fourths as in the bill.—Mr. Pease believed that very few tenants would be ready to purchase.—Mr. Gregory was for the scale as it stood in the bill, because to render the clause operative it must be made as easy as possible.—Sir H. Bruce was for the amendment.—Mr. J. Howard did not believe that the scheme was necessary for the pacification of Ireland. The previous portions of the bill were based on the principle of giving security of tenure, and, when that was obtained, the passion for the possession of land would die out.—Mr. Maguire did not believe that the operation of the bill would destroy in the Irish people the natural wish for that complete security of tenure which was afforded by the possession of the fee simple of their holdings.—Mr. O'Reilly believed that an advance of three-fourths of the price of a holding would leave an abundant margin for security, and that many tenants would be in a position to provide the remaining one-fourth.—Mr. Downing suggested two-thirds.—Mr. Selater-Booth's amendment was then withdrawn, and the clause was amended by making the limit of the advance two-thirds of the purchase-money, and the annuity extend to thirty-five years at £5 per cent., instead of twenty-two years at £6 10s.—Sir G. Jenkinson then, in the interest of Scotch and Irish ratepayers, moved the rejection of the clause as amended.—Colonel Cubitt opposed the clause. Such holdings meant small produce, the idea of a peasant proprietary was pleasant but he ridiculed it in practice.—Mr. Gladstone said the scheme if worth anything was in the interest of the British taxpayers, as designed to supply security and confidence for Ireland. The House would hold in its hands the power of saying how far the experiment should be carried out, and the only thing now asked of Parliament was that the thing should be tried.—Mr. Hardy said it was not wise to endorse by the sanction of Parliament the principle that the ownership of land was a better thing than the occupation. He protested against the clause as socialistic and communistic, and the commencement of legislation which would create an evil at present without existence, and which posterity would regret when it found Ireland still unpacified and the distress and agitation among her people increased.—Mr. C. Fortescue supported the clause.—Mr. Pollard-Urquhart said the experiment had, through the instrumentality of the Credit Foncier of France and similar companies, been tried, and with the happiest results.—Lord Elcho remarked that in other cases the State had been in the habit of lending money to landlords to drain their estates. But if the Government found a tenant did not pay and ejected him, what would be the result? No one would dare to take the land, and it would be left tenantless upon the hands of the Government. Having granted this privilege to Ireland, how could a similar demand in the case of England and Scotland be refused?—Colonel Bartelot said the system of small proprietors had not proved successful in France. The properties in that country were mortgaged to the chimney-tops. This provision would prove a curse instead of a blessing.—Mr. J. Howard said it was not the duty of the State to interfere either in the aggregation of large estates or in their disintegration.—Mr. G. Gregory said the result of the clause would be nothing else but the actual sacrifice of a large sum of money.—Mr. Sinclair Aytoun opposed this waste of the public money.—Mr. Corrance said that by this experiment they were about to violate all the great principles by which a state should be governed.—Mr. Whalley condemned this part of the measure as holding out a direct premium to conspiracy, murder, and outrage in Ireland.—On a division the clause was carried by a majority of 114 to 27.—The remaining clauses 42–68 were agreed to with slight and verbal amendments.—The new clauses were then taken.—Mr. Chichester Fortescue carried the following new clause, to be inserted after clause 1:—"If, in the case of any holding not situate within the province of Ulster, it shall appear that a usage prevails which in all essential particulars corresponds with the Ulster tenant-right custom, it shall, in like manner, and subject to the like conditions, be deemed legal, and shall be enforced in manner provided by this Act. Where the landlord has purchased, or shall hereafter purchase, from the tenant the benefit of such usage as aforesaid to which his holding is subject, such holding shall thenceforth cease to be subject to such usage. A tenant of any holding subject to such usage as aforesaid, and who claims the benefit of the same, shall not be entitled to claim compensation under any other section of this Act; but a tenant of a holding not claiming the benefit of such usage shall not be barred from making a claim for compensation with the consent of the Court under any of the other sections of this Act, and where such last-mentioned claim has been made and allowed, such holding shall not be again subject to such usage as aforesaid."—Mr. Chichester Fortescue also proposed a clause to go after clause 3, providing that where a tenant has received permission to obtain satisfaction from an incoming tenant he shall not be entitled to compensation under section 3.—The clause was negatived.—A clause proposed by Mr. Kavanagh to deprive yearly tenants assigning their interests without the consent of landlords of the right to transmit a claim for compensation, was, on a division, negatived by a majority of 192 to 120.—A clause by Mr. Bagwell conferring on every tenant the right to a lease for twenty-one years, renewable for ever, was negatived.—Progress was then reported.

The Attorney-General nominated the select committee on the Public Prosecutors Bill.—The Attorney-General, Mr. Hardy, Mr. Vernon Harcourt, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Bonham-Carter, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Hibbert, Dr. Ball, Mr. Downing, Mr. Gordon, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Scourfield, Mr. West, Mr. Staveley Hill, and Mr. Eykyn.

May 17.—The Municipal Corporation Bill.—Mr. C. Buxton moved the second reading of this, the first of three bills for the reorganisation of the government of the metropolis. The present measure would establish a federation of municipal bodies by creating a municipality in each of the Parliamentary boroughs to deal with local affairs, with a central body over all to transact the general business of the metropolis. He was willing to refer the bills to a select committee if they were read a second time.—Mr. C. Bentinck opposed the bill. It did not establish an efficient central authority. He preferred the scheme of the committee of 1867, which proposed to make the Metropolitan Board of Works the governing body.—Mr. Morrison supported the bill.—Lord J. Manners thought that only the Government could deal with this question, and that only if it secured the co-operation of the existing local bodies. As a rule, his official experience led him to be satisfied generally with the manner in which they did their work.—Mr. J. Locke was in favour of extending the jurisdiction of the City Corporation all over the whole metropolitan area.—Mr. W. H. Smith inclined to this particular solution of the difficulty, but agreed that it should be left to the Government.—Mr. Bruce admitted that only the Government could successfully legislate on this matter, and supported the suggestion to refer the bills to a select committee, not with any expectation of completing the inquiry this session, but in the hope that it would assist the Government to frame a bill.—Mr. R. Gurney, on the part of the Corporation of London, offered their co-operation in a general inquiry.—Sir W. Tite gave a similar assent on behalf of the Metropolitan Board of Works.—Mr. Alderman Lawrence and Colonel Sykes praised the Corporation.—Mr. Samuda thought it not worth while to give a second reading to a bill which nobody seemed to approve.—Sir G. Grey opposed this bill.—Mr. Muntz supported it.—On a division the second reading was carried by a majority of 130 to 66. It was then ordered to be referred to a select committee, but a dispute arising as to the powers of this committee, the two other bills were adjourned until Monday.

The Married Women's Property Bill (No. 1).—Mr. Russell Gurney moved the second reading. As regarded her property, the entry into the state of matrimony had much the same effect on a woman as a conviction for felony. This law had existed for a long time, but it was the result rather of accident than of design. After enlarging on the evil he said the remedy proposed by the bill was to repeal the law under which the wife forfeited her property by the act of marriage, and to enact that she should be allowed to retain control over it, independently of her husband. It had been objected that the creditors of the husband would always be uncertain whether the property which they sought to seize belonged to the husband or to his wife, but that difficulty frequently occurred under the law of marriage settlements. In the next place, it was objected that the bill would introduce discord into families and would depose the husband from his headship. Had such a result followed upon the system of marriage settlements, and, if not, was it more likely to occur in the cases which would be affected by the bill? The principle of the bill had been adopted in America with most advantageous results, and it had also been incorporated in the code of Indian law.—Mr. Raikes agreed as to the hardships of the existing law, but feared that bill No. 1 would lead to others far worse. He trusted, however, that both bill No. 1 and his own bill (No. 2) would be read a second time, in order that they might be referred to a select committee. His principal objection was that it aimed at establishing the novel principle of an equality between the sexes. It would disturb the peace of every family, and diminish for ever that identity of interests at present existing between husband and wife which had hitherto been regarded as the basis of the Christian family, and a proper ornament to society. Also it created an inequality between husband and wife; it retained to the wife the sole use of her property, and yet still obliged the husband to support the family.—Mr. Jessel said bill No. 2 proposed to transfer to a trustee all the property of a married woman except such as was transferable by mere delivery. The poor woman had no other property but what was transferable by delivery, consisting of clothes and perhaps a small sum of money; and this, the property most urgently needing protection, would be excepted from the operation of the Act.—The bill was read a second time.

The Married Women's Property Bill (No. 2).—Mr. Raikes having moved the second reading, Mr. Jacob Bright moved its rejection, and the bill was thrown out by a majority of 208 to 46.

May 19.—The Case of Mr. Edmunds.—Sir James Eliot, stone asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was true that he was about to incarcerate Mr. Edmunds? He suggested that the object was to hamper him in his action for libel against the Treasury.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that a writ had been issued for the £7,000 odd in which the arbitrators had found Mr. Edmunds indebted. The law officers had advised this course, and he certainly did not intend to hold his hand; this need not interfere with Mr. Edmunds' action.—Mr. Horsman thought that Mr. Edmunds, though foolish and obstinate, had not been guilty of any fraudulent practice making him worthy of incarceration.—The Attorney-General said that, though he would not accuse Mr. Edmunds of fraud, the case against him had a serious aspect.—Sir J. Elphinstone gave notice that on a future day he would move for a commission.

The Irish Land Bill.—Committee. New clauses.—Sir John Gray proposed a clause providing for a scheme of "Permissive Parliamentary Tenant Right." The absolute owners of estates not within clauses 1 and 2 were to be able to register them as coming under regulations by which a tenant should not be disturbed in his holding except for non-payment of rent, subletting, or waste, the rent to be determined in case of disagreement by the arbitration, at stated intervals, of the Court. The limited owner was not to be able to bind the estate beyond thirty-one years after his death.—Mr. Chichester Fortescue opposed the scheme, as being in reality perpetuity of tenure.—Mr. C. Read, Dr. Ball, the Solicitor-General for Ireland, and Mr. G. Gregory also opposed it.—Mr. W. H. Gregory, Mr. Synan, Mr. M'Mahon, Lord St. Lawrence and Mr. O'Reilly supported it. It was rejected by a majority of 317 to 29. A clause proposed by Sir H. Bruce, to render letting in connexure a sub-letting, under certain circumstances, was rejected by a majority of 177 to 90.—Progress was then reported.

IRELAND.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Before FITZGERALD and DEASY, BB.)

May 13.—In re George Drinan.

Waters, Q.C., and Mark O'Shaughnessy, for Mr. Drinan, moved that he be admitted an attorney, under the provisions of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 84, under the following circumstances:—It appeared that he had for nine years been in his father's office in Cork, was articled in June, 1866, and conducted his father's business. His father, Mr. William Andrew Drinan, died on the 1st of May instant, and it was absolutely necessary for the interests of his clients that the applicant should be at once admitted, as several suits were pending in various courts. Upwards of twenty of the clients had signed a certificate asking for his admission at once, although he had not served the full five years. Counsel asked that he be admitted without the usual examination, as every day was of importance, and it would take time to prepare for an examination.

Shekleton appeared for the Law Society, and stated that his clients would not consent unless he passed an examination.

After some discussion,

The Court decided that Mr. Drinan should be admitted provided that he passed an oral examination, which it was arranged should take place on Monday next.

(Before Master BURKE and a Jury.)

May 14.—Goddard v. Canavan.

This was an action for penalties for practising as an unlicensed conveyancer in contravention of 27 Vict. c. 2, s. 3. It now came before the master for assessment of damages. The plaintiff was secretary to the council of the Incorporated Law Society, but the case had been virtually instituted by the judges of the Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency. It transpired in the matter of F. Little, an insolvent, that the defendant, a law clerk, had prepared two leases, bearing date respectively the 6th and 8th of December, 1869, which fact the defendant admitted, and on that admission the proceedings were instituted by the plaintiff as the officer of the Law Society. The defendant had allowed judgment to go by default, but had forwarded to the plaintiff a statement to the effect that he had only acted as a scrivener, and that he had merely filled up the blanks in printed leaves as clerk to a Mr. George Robert Magrath, an attorney.

Shekleton, for the plaintiff.

The MASTER, in charging the jury, dwelt on the importance of the case to the public, who were on many occasions indebted to the Law Society for the vigorous manner in which they took up and prosecuted all matters in which the character of their profession was at stake and the public interests endangered, and he directed the jury to assess such damages by way of penalties as they should think would meet the exigencies of the present case.

Verdict, £5 for each offence (there being two), with 6d. costs.

THE INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS.

The half-yearly meeting of this society was held on the 14th instant, in the Solicitors' Hall, Sir J. T. Orpen, President of the Society, in the chair.

The statement of accounts for the half-year was adopted, showing a balance to the credit of the society, amounting to £684 4s. 10d.

In reply to Mr. Shannon,

Mr. Goddard, secretary, stated that no compromise or arrangement had been entered into respecting the relations existing between the society and the benchers.

Mr. Shannon called attention to the question of an amalgamation of the professions of barrister and solicitor, which had recently excited a great deal of attention in England. It was a matter which, he thought, should be fully considered, as many of his profession were opposed to, and many in favour of, the proposal. Of course the society had every confidence in the council that represented them.

Mr. Dillon observed that opinion on the subject was very much divided, but he hoped the council would give the matter their serious consideration.

Mr. Findlater called attention to a case which had recently come before the Court of Common Pleas, in which an attorney's clerk had sought to be admitted to practice on the ground that he had served ten years. Since the education movement had taken place, it had been the desire of the council to elevate as much as possible the educational standard; but he was sorry to say that they had not been met by the other branch of the profession in the same spirit. The judges had put a construction on the Act of Parliament which, he believed, it never was intended to bear—that a man acting in any capacity in an attorney's office for ten years could be looked upon as having served ten years. According to the interpretation of the judges, the solicitors would be obliged to receive persons into their profession of whom they did not approve.

Mr. Macrory said it seemed as if the Bench considered the particular function of an attorney was to prepare a bill of costs. One judge had stated that it was their great effort of memory and imagination. It might be a good joke, but it was rather stale, and did not come well from the quarter from which it had proceeded.

Mr. Goddard mentioned a case in which he had appeared to-day before Master Burke, on the part of the society, in which an attorney's clerk, named Michael Joseph Canavan, had prepared certain conveyances in the hope of fee, gain, and reward. The case was in the nature of an inquiry, and had been referred by Judge Miller, of the Bankruptcy Court, to Master Burke. The inquiry was instituted under the 27th Vict. c. 8, s. 3, and he wished it to be known that there was a statute applicable to such cases. Master Burke held the inquiry with a jury of six, who assessed damages at £5 for each offence.

Mr. W. M. Jones said it was desirable that the question of the abolition of the solicitors' licence duty should not be allowed to rest. It had formerly been urged as an objection that the state of the revenue could not afford it; but now the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a surplus of £4,000,000, and it was to be hoped that next year there would be a larger surplus still. It was a tax which placed the solicitors on a par with pedlars, auctioneers, and people of that sort, and the council ought to take measures to have it removed, if possible.

Mr. Shannon observed that on a previous occasion, when they sought to have the tax abolished, Mr. Gladstone had said that they might as well be asked to abolish the licence duty on hawkers, pedlars, &c. But, by the present budget, these, their fellow-sufferers, were relieved (laughter), but the solicitors were left out in the cold still.

The Chairman, in reference to the previous subject, said that in the Chancery Act an interpretation clause had been inserted to the effect that "the words 'town agent' shall mean town agent being a practising solicitor."

M. H. A. Dillon, referring to the question of the abolition of the solicitors' licence duty, said that recently, while he and some other members of the council were in London on another matter, Mr. Denman kindly undertook to present to Parliament a petition which they had drawn up on the subject. Mr. Denman, however, at the same time informed them that, to his knowledge, the opinions of the solicitors of London did not coincide with theirs in reference to the question of the abolition of the tax.

Mr. Anderson having been called to the second chair, the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

OBITUARY.

MR. H. R. BAGSHAW, Q.C.

Henry Ridgard Bagshaw, Esq., Q.C., Judge of the Clerkenwell County Court, died on the 16th of May, at his residence, Fellow's-road, Haverstock-hill, in the seventy-first year of his age. He was the youngest son of the late Sir William Chambers Bagshaw, of The Oaks, near Sheffield (formerly High Sheriff of Derbyshire), by Ellen, daughter of N. Ridgard, Esq., of Gainsborough, Lincolnshire. He was born in 1799, and was educated at the grammar-schools of Oakham and Richmond, in Yorkshire, whence he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A., in 1822. He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in November, 1825, and practised for many years at the Chancery Bar; he was created a Queen's Counsel in 1854. Shortly after this he was elected a Bencher of the Middle Temple, and served in his turn as treasurer of that society. In October, 1831, he was appointed Judge of the County Courts of Cardiganshire, Carmarthenshire, and Pembrokeshire (Circuit No. 31), which office he filled till June, 1868, when he was transferred to the Clerkenwell district (Circuit No. 41). He was a Justice of the Peace for Middlesex, and also for the several Welsh counties wherein he formerly exercised judicial functions. The late Mr. Bagshaw married, in 1824, Catherine Elizabeth, eldest daughter of John Gunning, Esq., C.B., who was Surgeon-in-Chief of the British Army at the Battle of Waterloo, by which lady he had a family of five sons and five daughters.

MR. W. SWAINSON.

Mr. William Swainson, solicitor, of Portsmouth, died on the 17th May, at High-street, Portsmouth, age sixty-two years. Mr. Swainson was certificated in Hilary Term, 1845, and for some years was employed in the legal department of Somerset House, where his father had also served. About ten years ago he was appointed solicitor to the Admiralty at Portsmouth, and also held the office of Admiralty coroner for the county of Southampton and the Isle of Wight. Last year Mr. Swainson acted as Churchwarden of the parish of St. Thomas, Portsmouth, and at the last Easter vestry he consented to act again in that capacity.

Mr. William H. G. Jones, solicitor, of Crosby-square, City, having recently been appointed a magistrate for Merionethshire, in North Wales, has withdrawn from the profession of the law in London, and resigned the office of vestry-clerk to the parish of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate-street. At a recent meeting of the vestry of this parish, a very complimentary vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Jones, "for the very efficient manner in which he had fulfilled the duties of the office for a period of forty-five years, and for the courtesy that had all that time marked his bearing towards the parishioners." Mr. Jones has also resigned all his other appointments in the City, retaining only his connection with the Corporation of London, of which he is now the senior member.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

THE LAW ASSOCIATION.

The annual general court of the above association was held on Thursday at the Law Institution, Chancery-lane, Mr. G. Harding in the chair. Mr. Boodle, the secretary, read the report, which stated that during the year thirty cases had been relieved by the distribution amongst them of £1,302, and £200 had been distributed among twenty-two cases of the widows and families of non-members. Two recipients of the association's relief had died during the year, and had been replaced by the widows of two members who had died. During the year eleven members had died, and six had withdrawn, while eight new members had been enrolled. The capital stock of the association now amounts to £33,225 6s. 8d., yielding annual dividends amounting to £1,148. In addition to the income from the dividends the annual subscriptions of 305 members amounted in the past year to £640 10s.; making the total income £1,788 10s. The sum of £150 had been voted to the directors for the ensuing year, to enable them to meet applications for relief from the widows and families of non-members. The chairman, with a few remarks as to the great and growing usefulness of the association, moved the adoption of the report.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society, held on Tuesday, the 17th of May, Mr. Hepburn in the chair, the question for discussion was No. CLXXXVII. Jurisprudential: "Should conventual and monastic establishments be subject to Government inspection?" Mr. Gordon opened the debate in the affirmative, on which side the question was decided by a large majority.

COURT PAPERS.

THE BANKRUPTCY REPEAL AND INSOLVENT COURT ACT, 1869.

RULE OF COURT.

It is ordered,—That where application to the Court for postponing the close of an insolvency is made by the provisional and official assignee by reason of any insolvent debtor being under contempt of court, or being under obligation to make or having omitted to make any payment in pursuance of any order or proposal under his insolvency, or upon any other grounds, there shall be filed, instead of the affidavit mentioned in rule 30, a certificate by the aforesaid officer or the assistant receiver, setting forth the grounds for such application. A copy of the order, if any, made on such application, must be served on the insolvent debtor or his representative, and any other parties intended to be bound or affected thereby, in such manner as the judge shall direct, and thereon proceedings shall be taken as in rule 30.

HATHERLEY, C.

JAMES BACON,

Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

AMERICAN JURYWOMEN.

An American contemporary prints a letter from Judge Howe of Cheyenne, Wyoming, containing the following remarks on a grand jury "de medietate sexus":—

"These women chose to serve, and were duly empanelled as jurors. They are educated, cultivated Eastern ladies, who are an honour to their sex. They have, with true womanly devotion, left their homes of comfort in the States, to share the fortunes of their husbands and brothers in the far west, and to aid them in founding a new state beyond the Missouri. . . . These women acquitted themselves with such dignity, decorum, propriety of conduct and intelligence, as to win the admiration of every fair minded citizen of Wyoming. They were careful, painstaking, intelligent, and conscientious. They were firm and resolute for the right as established by the law and the testimony. Their verdicts were right, and after three or four criminal trials the lawyers engaged in defending persons accused of crime began to avail themselves of the right of peremptory challenge to get rid of the women jurors, who were too much in favour of enforcing the laws and punishing crime to suit the interests of their clients. After the grand jury had been in session two days, the dance-house keepers, gamblers, and demi-monde fled out of the city in dismay to escape the indictment of women grand jurors. In short, I have never, in twenty-five years of constant experience in the courts of the country, seen a more faithful, intelligent and resolutely honest grand and petit jury than these.

"A contemptibly lying and silly despatch went over the wires to the effect that during the trial of A. W. Howe for homicide (in which the jury consisted of six women and six men) the men and women were kept locked up together all night for four nights. Only two nights intervened during the trial, and on these nights, by my order, the jury were taken to the parlour of the large, commodious and well-furnished hotel of the Union Pacific Railroad, in charge of the sheriff and a woman bailiff, where they were supplied with meals and every comfort, and at ten o'clock the women were conducted by the bailiff to a large and suitable apartment, where beds were prepared for them, and the men to another adjoining, where beds were prepared for them, where they remained in charge of sworn officers until morning, when they were again all conducted to the parlour, and from thence in a body to breakfast, and thence to a juryroom, which was a clean and comfortable one, carpeted and heated, and furnished with all proper conveniences. . . . The presence of these ladies in court secured the most perfect decorum and propriety of conduct, and the gentlemen of the bar and others vied with each other in their courteous and respectful demeanour towards the ladies and the Court. Nothing occurred to offend the most refined lady (if she was a sensible lady), and the universal judgment of every intelligent and fair-minded man present was and is, that the experiment was a success."

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds have been very firm during the week, and have established and maintained an advance in price. Foreign securities still maintain the strong position they have now so long held. The railway market has been steady on the whole, though this and the general share market have been not quite so firm as the others.

We understand that Mr. Gordon Whitbread, of the Chancery bar, who is at present the principal secretary to the Lord Chancellor, will succeed the late Mr. H. R. Bagshawe, Q.C., as judge of the Clerkenwell County Court. Mr. Whitbread was called to the bar in 1840.

Mr. George Waters, Q.C., of the Irish bar, took the oaths and his seat as M.P. for Mallow on the 18th May, in succession to Mr. Henry Munster, of the English bar, who was unseated on petition. Mr. Waters was called to the bar in Ireland in Trinity term 1849.

Mr. Justice Lawson, a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, was sworn in a member of the English Privy Council, at Windsor Castle, on the 18th May. Mr. Justice Lawson is also one of the Irish Church Commissioners, on account of his duties connected with which he has been added to the Queen's Council of England.

Judge Blathford, of New York, has denied a motion to discharge an attachment granted at the suit of John N. Cushing and others, against property in America of John Laird, builder of the Alabama, and looking to the recovery of damages for the destruction of the ship Sonora.

AMENITIES OF THE NEW YORK BAR.—Just after the adjournment of the N. Farland trial a lively passage occurred between the two leading counsel on either side. The crowd was gradually leaving the court-room, and the Recorder, the City Judge, and many professional gentlemen within the bar were preparing to go to ex-Judge Russel's funeral, when Judge Davis made a remark to the Recorder with regard to Mr. Graham's conduct of the defence, saying that the latter had stated something in one of his bitter speeches that he could not prove. Mr. Graham, who stood near, talking to the prisoner and Mr. Gerry, overheard him, and, rushing up to Judge Davis, shouted, "Do you mean to say that anything that I have said is false?" Before Judge Davis could reply Mr. Graham continued, shaking his clenched fist in Judge Davis's face, "You — country pettifogger! you are not fit to associate with gentlemen; you —! I could undress you and spank you like a child. You have insulted every witness I brought on the stand, and you have been paid money to hang this man!" Mr. Gerry and several others rushed up to Mr. Graham, and Recorder Hackett stepped up and interfered, when Mr. Graham pushed him aside, saying, "Don't interfere; you have no right to; you helped this man insult me by your rebuke from the bench." Officers then came between the parties and they were separated, and this ended the matter. The expletives which Mr. Graham used were not very choice. The crowd became highly excited, and one man proposed three cheers for John Graham, which were loudly given. When Mr. Graham went out he was loudly cheered by hundreds who had assembled on the staircase. The jury had departed before this passage between counsel occurred. —New York Times.

UNITED LAW CLERKS' SOCIETY.

ESTABLISHED 1832.

PATRONS.

THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR.
 THE RIGHT HON. THE LORDS JUSTICES.
 THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND.
 THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE COMMON PLEAS.
 THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD CHIEF BARON.

TRUSTEES.

EDWARD SMITH BIGG, Esq., The Hyde, Crawley.
 FRANCIS THOMAS BIRCHAM, Esq., Parliament-street.
 NATHANIEL CHARLES MILNE, Esq., Temple.

THE UNITED LAW CLERKS' SOCIETY was established in 1832 by a few Managing Clerks, who had long witnessed with pain the distressed condition of many of their fellow Clerks when deprived of health, and the want and privation many underwent when overtaken by old age; also the sufferings often endured by their Widows and Families on their decease, for whom provision was seldom made. A Fund was created by small monthly contributions, out of which relief was to be afforded in sickness, pensions granted to aged and infirm Members, and assistance given to the families of deceased Members.

A Benevolent Fund (to which every Member contributed) was also formed to assist distressed Clerks, whether Members or not, their Widows and Families, with small gifts of money, not exceeding £5. Under certain necessary restrictions, this assistance is afforded to all deserving Law Clerks and their Families whose distress arises through unavoidable misfortune.

The Society at its commencement obtained the support of Edward Foss, Esq., E. S. Bigg, Esq., (the late M. Cloyton, Esq.), E. W. Scadding, Esq., (the late G. H. Kinderley, Esq.) (the late R. Maugham, Esq.) and other eminent members of the Profession, whose early, zealous, and energetic support, has materially contributed to its usefulness and present favourable position.

Among the benefits are—

A weekly allowance in sickness of	£1 1 0
Pensions payable weekly, varying from.....	10s. to 0 14 0
A payment on a Member's death of	50 0 0
On the decease of a Member's wife, a payment of	25 0 0

In addition, out of the Benevolent or Casual Fund, Law Clerks, whether members or not, and their families, are entitled to relief.

LONDON, MAY 28, 1870.

THE MANIFESTO of the Common Law Judges against the High Court of Justice Bill—for it is nothing less—which will be found elsewhere in our columns, is doubtless entitled to very grave consideration, but nevertheless we most sincerely hope that Parliament will see fit almost utterly to disregard it. The general question involved has occupied so much of our attention lately that we do not propose to discuss the objections of the judges at any length; to do so would be, in effect, to repeat what we have already said respecting this and the sister bill; but we think it due to their Lordships not to let so weighty a document pass entirely without comment.

The first resolution, if it be read literally, amounts to a postponement of all reform in this matter "ad Græcas Kalendas," for certainly if we have to wait for "a careful consolidation of the common law and equity law" with an "express" legislative "provision as to what the law shall be in each particular instance," it is far within the mark to say that the great-grandchildren of the youngest barrister living will probably not live to see the High Court of Justice in active operation. When we read this resolution, we, for the first time, fully understood the full force of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn's remark that the judges had not thought the matter one requiring their immediate attention, because they had expected to get the New Palace of Justice first. It may, however, be, and we hope it is so, that this is not the true meaning of their Lordships, and that they only desire that the Legislature should clearly lay down a rule sufficient for the guidance of the judges whose duty it may be to declare the law "in each particular instance." But if so, we think that the amended bill has complied with this resolution; and if we are right in reading it as enacting "that every right now lawfully existing either at law or in equity shall be enforceable as heretofore, and that every defence now properly raiseable at law or in equity shall be available as heretofore," save only that in any case of conflict of principle the rule which would now practically prevail shall be the one directly to govern the case (and we think that is precisely the effect of the bill), then all that the judges can reasonably require on this point is already laid down for them, and their first resolution, thus read, never can have any operation. Surely it is the province of the judges to declare "in each particular instance" what is the law; if it be not, the whole process whereby is strangely misconceived; and if it be, surely all that can reasonably be asked of the Legislature is to lay down certain broad principles to guide the course of decision, where, and only where, it has shown a tendency to stray from the right path. This is precisely what seems to us to be done by the 13th section of the amended Bill. That section is, perhaps, not very happily worded, and our attention has been called to a somewhat grotesque confusion in the tenses used in it; but to mere verbal criticism of this sort the judges have not condescended, and we do not at present intend to set them the example.

"Justice slowly broadens down
From precedent to precedent"

The second resolution appears to us singularly unfortunate. It amounts to this, that the High Court of Justice should be an exclusively civil court, leaving all the existing divided and peculiar jurisdictions in criminal, and we presume revenue, matters; for what good end we know not. If it be desirable that one particular division should monopolise the Crown business the rules and orders can so provide, and, indeed, the Act provides that these "peculiarities" shall remain unless removed by general order. There may, perhaps, be some good ground for vesting the high prerogative jurisdiction in the High Court itself alone; but why an exceptional court should be kept alive to exercise this jurisdiction, its other functions being transferred to the High Court, or the Legislature should indissolubly attach it to one of the divisional courts, passes our comprehension. And yet, if the second resolution is to be carried out, one of these two courses must be taken.

The third resolution relates to matter of taste merely. We have already expressed our adherence to the opposite view from that advocated by the judges, and are glad to see that all the law lords who have spoken on the point practically adopt our view. Indeed, we have reason to believe that the bill only provides for the present continuance of the existing names in deference to what was mistakenly believed to be the opinion of Lord Cairns.

We have already given our reasons for differing from their Lordships upon the fourth resolution, save in so far as it proposes to vest the power of making rules in the Court, and not in the Privy Council, with which we entirely agree. We quite agree with the judges that it is of the highest importance that trial by jury and oral evidence in open court should be retained in all proper cases; but we think that the judges are more likely to be able to say, pro re nata, what is a proper case than is Parliament to lay down indefeasible a priori rules on the subject.

With the 5th and 6th resolutions, and the separate opinion of Mr. Justice Willes, we fully concur; but the alterations in the bill rendered necessary thereby would be neither vital nor complicated, and need not, if all other opposition were disarmed or withdrawn, imperil the passing of the bill.

The observations of the judges are, in effect, directed against the High Court of Justice Bill alone, and we must take this opportunity of reiterating our regret that the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill is not cut loose from the other and allowed to pass, as it would probably do, if alone, without serious opposition, without any further delay.

MR. HIBBERT'S BILL to relieve clergymen who have got tired or disgusted with their calling, from civil disabilities, was read a second time on Wednesday morning. The debate upon the measure was not interesting, for there seemed a general unanimity of opinion that it was not worth while to tie a man down for life to a profession for which he admitted himself to have become unfit. The grievance complained of is now almost entirely political. For as to the trades and professions, they are open to a clergyman if he chooses to adopt any of them, without Parliamentary intervention. There is more than one "clerical barrister." But as we have already pointed out in this journal (ante p. 354) no ordained minister of the Church can sit in the House of Commons. After Horne Tooke's election at the commencement of the century, an Act excluding priests and deacons was passed. Some say that it was declaratory; others that it introduced new law; but, however, that may be, it is, no doubt, an effectual barrier against any clergyman being returned as a member of Parliament. He is as effectually disqualified as a woman. Now, there is really no good reason for maintaining this restriction, which would in all probability have never been solemnly enacted had Horne Tooke been less obnoxious to the powers which then were, and we are, therefore, not surprised that the House, generally speaking, took a favourable view of Mr. Hibbert's proposal. If it should become law it will open a question as to the exclusion of Roman Catholic priests, and the repeal of 41 Geo. 3, c. 63, might perhaps entail that of 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, s. 9, which excepts the Roman Catholic priests from the general scope of the Roman Catholic emancipation. If it should once more become possible for the clergy to sit in the House of Commons, we shall have another singular instance of history repeating itself. All reform, we have been told on high authority, is reaction. We have recently returned, according to Mr. Homersham Cox, to our ancient parliamentary qualification in boroughs; and the permission to persons in holy orders, to sit in the House of Commons, will really be no more than a restitution to them of a right which they once unquestionably possessed.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN has brought in a bill to "protect the goods of lodgers against executions upon the property of the landlord." The bill proposes to enact that no superior landlord shall be entitled to distrain for rent due by his immediate lessee or tenant on the furniture, goods, and chattels of any under-lessee, under-tenant, or lodger of such immediate lessee or tenant, unless the under-lessee, under-tenant, or lodger has in writing guaranteed the payment of such rent. If a superior landlord or lessee levies or threatens to levy, or authorises any person to levy or threaten to levy, a distress on the furniture, goods, and chattels of any under-lessee, under-tenant, or lodger for rent due, his immediate tenant or lessee, the under-tenant, under-lessee, or lodger is to serve on such landlord or person a statutory declaration to the effect that the immediate tenant or lessee has no interest in the furniture, goods, and chattels, but that such are the absolute property or in the possession of the under-lessee, under-tenant, or lodger. An inventory of the furniture, goods, and chattels is to be made, signed by the under-tenant, under-lessee, or lodger, and referred to in and annexed to the declaration. To sign an untrue inventory wilfully is to be a misdemeanour, and a landlord or his agent persisting in a distress after being served with a declaration and inventory is to be guilty of a misdemeanour, and be further liable to an action for damages.

The scope of the bill is very comprehensive, taking in as it does not only lodgers in the ordinary acceptation of the term, but under-tenants and under-lessees. Where land is to let on a building lease the bill will, if it becomes law, practically prevent the landlord from distraining for the ground rent unless the under-lessee has guaranteed the payment thereof in writing. It would, of course, be open to ground landlords to prohibit subletting without a licence, and to make a guarantee by the sub-tenant a condition of granting a licence. This would, however, interfere somewhat with the freedom of granting building leases, and the bill, were it to become law, would require some limitation of its operation in this direction. We believe, however, that the law as it now stands is preferable to that proposed by this measure.

IT APPEARS, FROM THE SECOND REPORT of the Digest of Law Commission, which we reprint elsewhere, that the three specimen digests of the Law of Bills of Exchange, Mortgages, and Easements, on which Messrs. Macleod, Fisher, and Goddard have been engaged, are not destined for completion as such. The Commissioners recommend that the magnum opus itself should be at once put in hand, the experiments abandoned, and the inchoate specimens built into the main work as "materials of considerable value." Like Don Quixote, when engaged on the manufacture of his head-piece, the Commissioners find the experiment too costly. The experiment, they say, has been useful, but they desire to prosecute it no further, and to have the work set on foot at once, under the hands of the best men whom permanent employment and high remuneration can tempt. Thus the Commissioners verify almost word for word the predictions ventured by ourselves when first the specimen digest scheme was mooted.* The men to whom such a work is committed must be men of the very highest ability, and men acknowledged to be such. The work will have to be highly paid for or it will be of no use. There ought to be no difficulty in fixing on and securing the workmen; the honour of completing such a task will at least be as great as that of an elevation to the bench. One of the new Commissioners, Mr. Justice Willes, dissents from the report, because he prefers a code. One thing is clear, that as long as the piecemeal alteration of the law of property goes on year after year it will be impossible to bring out a digest of any permanent worth.

WE BELIEVE that the Legal Education scheme of the committee on which Mr. Quain, Q.C., and others are engaged, is now virtually ready for issue, and may be expected to be placed before the public almost immediately. The committee recommend a certain modification of the scheme formerly proposed by Mr. Jevons; and it is intended, as we have been informed, to introduce a bill before the end of the present parliamentary session. With the whole of the long vacation for consideration of whatever may be proposed we may fairly anticipate legislation on the matter next session.

WE HAVE RECEIVED the following suggestions for re-organising the executive departments of the county courts. They have, we understand, been forwarded to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Judicature Commission by an experienced county court officer. Some of the points have already been discussed in these columns:—

1. "It is estimated that the public waste, at least, a million and a half of the printed forms supplied to them gratis for issuing process. These forms cost about £600, which would be saved if a penny stamp were impressed on each form. These penny stamps would produce over £6,000 per annum, and if they were on sale at the post offices as well as at the courts' offices, the convenience to the public would generally far more than counterbalance the penny outlay."

2. "The summonses should be served through the post, which would be a far more prompt mode of service than the present. The service might nearly always be made within two days of issue, while at present it is no uncommon occurrence for weeks to intervene, the delay causing frequent loss to the suitors. The addition to post-office work would be inconsiderable, as there would be a summons to every four hundred letters, and the trouble to the postman would be about that of returning an undelivered letter; the postman should sign an endorsement on the copy of the summons, and that should be countersigned by the postmaster of the district. If the penalty of perjury were affixed to making a wilfully false return, the legal proof of service would be quite as good as it is now in the same cases."

3. "Judgment-summonses, which are served personally, should be served by the police, as they know much more about the habits of the people, their in-comings and out-goings, than a county court bailiff can know, whose district even in a large town is measured by miles, and in some parts of the country by scores of miles; the 120,000 issued in a year distributed amongst the 25,000 policemen of England and Wales would be a very slight addition to their labours. With regard to arrests, if the duty were thrown upon the police each man would have at the rate of one in seven months, according to the last return. Arrests are likely to be fewer under the Debtors Act, 1869. The execution of fi. fas. is a much more important matter, but that the duty would be better performed by the police than it is at present will hardly be denied by persons intimately acquainted with the working of the present system. The possession fees now charged might go to some fund for the benefit of the force generally or to form an addition to the wages of such as distinguished themselves for good conduct."

4. "The registrars should be reduced to one for each judge at the present maximum salary and should each have the management of all the courts on a circuit. They should, like the judges, devote themselves exclusively to their official duties. They would thus acquire far more extensive experience and would be more useful to the public than at present."

5. It is not easy to say, with anything like accuracy, what the actual saving would be to the country, but it might be taken at least as follows:—

Printed forms saved.....	£600
Penny stamps	6,000
High bailiffs' department abolished	130,000
Registrars' department	20,000

Total £156,600

There are numerous small items to be added, such as the saving of about 300,000 forms of bailiffs' affidavit of foreign service, a re-arrangement of the books of the courts, some of the information in which is repeated four or five times over, a better mode of supplying stationery, &c., &c., the whole of which in the aggregate offer an opportunity for reductions of something like a quarter of a million sterling, with greater efficiency than at present. This would considerably exceed the annual Parliamentary vote for the support of the courts, and if applied to the abolition of the vote there would still remain a surplus. It would probably however be found more satisfactory to the public if part of the money were devoted to the reduction of court fees, which might be lessened by one half (they are now about £350,000 per annum), and still leave a handsome surplus, either to go in reduction of the vote or to add to the salaries of policemen and postmen. With regard to displaced officials, the Post Office and the police service could soon absorb the greater part of them, and it would probably be desirable in some instances to pay a bonus for loss of office."

THE SEPARATE ESTATE OF A WIFE.

No. I.

A wife's "separate estate" is the creature of the Court of Equity, the common law not recognising her as possessing any property separately from her husband. It seems to have been formerly thought that a trustee was necessary to the creation of a separate estate. Lord Thurlow would appear to have entertained that idea from his language in the leading case of Hulme v. Tenant (1 Bro. C. C. 16, 1 Wh. & Ta. L. C.). But it has long been settled that property may be constituted the separate estate of a married woman without a trustee being interposed by the settlor; if necessary, the Court of Equity declares the husband trustee. Thus in Bennet v. Davis (2 P. W. 316), where one devised land in fee to his married daughter for her separate use without appointing trustees. The Master of the Rolls (Jekyll) held it a resulting trust in the husband, and so the land was preserved to the wife in spite of the husband's bankruptcy. And if personally be given to the wife's separate use without a trustee, and payment be made to her husband, he will be held a trustee for the wife. Lord Eldon, in Rich v. Cockell (9 Ves. 369), observed that a gift by a wife to her husband of her separate property is not to be inferred except on clear evidence; and, on the other hand, that as against the husband, an agreement to treat some gift made to the wife as separate estate is not to be presumed but on good evidence. Implications arising from their respective acts are not to be pressed against either husband or wife. But, to use the words of Vice-Chancellor Stuart, interpreting, in Gardner v. Gardner (1 Giff. 130), the drift of Lord Eldon's decision in Rich v. Cockell: "when there is sufficient evidence to show an intention on the part of the wife that the husband should employ the money for his own use or for the family expenditure, as he may think proper, the assent of the wife to such application of the money must put an end to the trust for her separate use."

Vice-Chancellor Kindersley laid it down in Blatchford v. Woolley (2 Dr. & Sm. 206, 11 W. R. 478) that though "personal property may be settled as to the corpus upon a married woman," "real estate cannot; the fee simple cannot be settled to the separate use of a married woman; only a life estate in real property can be so settled." This view is inconsistent with some of the older authorities—e.g., with Bennet v. Davis (sup.), and, since Taylor v. Meads (34 L. J. N. S. Ch. 206), must be rejected as not law.

Not only is the wife's separate estate, whether it consist of realty or personalty, protected from the disposition and the liabilities of the husband, but the wife may herself deal with it as though she were a feme sole (Peacock v. Monk, 2 Ves. 190). Thus she may deal with it inter vivos by will, as though she were unmarried. It had, indeed, been much doubted, until the last ten years, whether a married woman could dispose of the inheritance of land settled in fee to her separate use, otherwise than by a deed acknowledged as directed by the Fines and Recoveries Act. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley had held in Blatchford v. Woolley (sup.) that the wife "cannot deal with it, except by a deed acknowledged under the statute; she cannot devise it; the fee will descend to her heirs." And Lord Romilly, in Lechmere v. Brotheridge (32 Beav. 353, 11 W. R. 814) held the same. This position however, has been decisively overruled by Lord Westbury, in Taylor v. Meads (supra), and the investigation which is there given of the point is so very clear that we extract the passage in its entirety:—

"With regard to the ordinary equitable estate belonging to a feme covert—for example, where lands are given to trustees in fee upon trust for a married woman and her heirs, or for a single woman in fee, who afterwards marries—equity follows the law, and preserving the analogy between legal and equitable estates, requires that the equitable estate of the married woman shall be dealt with inter vivos in the same manner as a legal estate; and in like manner an estate of this nature cannot be devised by a feme covert, for the incapacity to make a will of lands by the 14th section of the Statute of Henry 8 in this respect, is not removed by the 1 Vict. c. 26; but the interest created by the separate use is the creature of the Court of Equity, to which there is nothing correspondent at law, and which would be deprived of its character if it were made subject to a form of alienation that proceeds upon the basis of the existence of control and interest in the husband, and personal disability in the wife. The violence thus done by courts of equity to the principles and policy of the common law as to the status of the wife during coverture is very remarkable, but the doctrine is established and must be consistently followed to its legitimate consequences."

It must now be regarded as finally settled, that where land has been given to a wife's separate use she may dispose of the inheritance by deed inter vivos, unacknowledged, and may also devise it by will; though practically, of course, her power of disposal is curtailed by the "restraint against anticipation," which was devised by Lord Thurlow, and first used by him in a settlement of which he was a trustee (See Parkes v. White, 11 Ves. 221).

Where there is no restraint on anticipation, the wife may not only dispose of her separate estate by will or direct alienation inter vivos, but she may also render it chargeable by means of her debts and engagements. On this head, the courts of equity are very frequently called upon to decide whether or no in some particular case a wife's separate estate is to be held liable to some debt or obligation. It will be borne in mind that the Court of Equity cannot, any more than a court of common law, proceed against a married woman in personam, in respect of her engagement; it only proceeds in rem, by laying its hand upon the property. Lord Thurlow ruled in Hulme v. Tenant (sup.) that the general engagements of a married woman shall operate upon her personal property and upon the rents and profits of her real property as they arise, but that the Court cannot seize on the corpus of the property where it is real estate, and by sale or mortgage raise the money required to meet the general engagements. That is still the law; and in Nantes v.

Corrook (9 Ves. 189), Lord Eldon refused to give execution against stock where there was no lien on the stock eo nomine. Now, however, that by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 11, stock is liable to execution, it is apprehended that, like other descriptions of personal property, it may be appropriated to meet general engagements.

We said just now that the Court of Equity acts only in rem on the separate property, and not in personam as against the married woman herself. It is observed in the very valuable notes appended in White & Tudor to Hulme v. Tenant, that the courts of common law who to a certain extent recognise this species of property, have gone much further, inasmuch as "when the husband and wife are taken in execution, if there be no collusion between the husband and the plaintiff, the wife will be detained if she have separate estate; but if she has no separate estate she will ordinarily be discharged. Of course, since the Act of last session neither the wife nor her husband can be taken in execution.

A married woman is under disability, both at law and in equity, as regards contracting: she cannot contract so as to give a remedy against her in personam (Aylett v. Ashton, 1 My. & Cr. 111), but she can contract so as to bind her separate property, because quoad that she can deal as though she were a feme sole. She may bind it, for instance, by agreeing to sell or charge it. In Hulme v. Tenant the husband and wife had entered into a joint bond, and it was held to bind her separate property.

This brings us to the question—one which very frequently arises in practice—how far is a married woman's separate property bound by her general engagements?—i.e., by liabilities incurred by her not in express contemplation of her separate property?

The authorities on this question were very ably summed up by Lord Justice Turner in Johnson v. Gallagher (3 D. F. & J. 515, 9 W. R. 506), which is the governing case. There a wife living apart from her husband, and having separate estate, went in debt for goods supplied to her in a trade which she carried on. The creditors filing a bill to make her separate estate available, Lord Justice Knight Bruce said that the fact that she bought the goods when a married woman, living apart from her husband, who, a stranger to the purchase, was not liable wholly or in part for the goods—was, whether the sellers were aware or unaware that she had separate property, insufficient to charge her on it. But Lord Justice Turner, in a very masterly review of the authorities, held that under such a circumstance the separate property would be bound. It was once thought that the principle on which the courts of equity gave a remedy to the wife's separate creditors against her separate property was the regarding the incurring of the obligation as in the nature of an appointment in favour of the creditor. Lord Cottenham went far to show the fallacy of this when, in Owens v. Dickenson (Cr. & Ph. 53), he observed that if that were so, the creditors would rank in priority of date whereas they were paid pari passu. The doctrine of appointment is long exploded, the real principle being that pointed out by Sir G. Turner in Johnson v. Gallagher: the Court "gives execution against the property, just as a court of law gives execution against the property of any other debtor." But we have already reached the limits of a single article, and must defer the remainder of what we have to say until another week.

The salary of the Town Clerk of Wakefield, has been advanced from £300 to £350 per annum.

Sir Adam Bittleston, of the Madras Bench, left India on his retirement from the Bench, on the 2nd April. He was born in 1817, and was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1841, after which he practised on the Midland Circuit. He acted as a revising barrister in 1850, and was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court at Madras in 1868, when he was knighted. In June, 1862, he was reappointed to the High Court of Judicature, then newly created. Having served for the prescribed period in India, he now retires on a pension, and will be succeeded by Mr. James Kernan, Q.C., of the Irish Bar.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

BETTING DEBTS IN THE PRESENT STATE OF THE LAW.

Bubb v. Yelverton, M.R., 18 W. R. 512.

In deciding this case the Master of the Rolls did not think it necessary to express any opinion as to whether bonds to secure money lost on bets on horse-races are good or not. Horse-races seem to have become a matter of public interest in the reign of James I. (Olliphant on Horses, p. 357), and the earliest Act relating to them is the 16 Car. 2, c. 7 (1664), which provided, amongst other things, that securities given for moneys lost at horse-racing were to be void. The Act 9 Anne, c. 14, enacted that all notes, bills, bonds, judgments, mortgages, or other securities or conveyances where the consideration was for money won by gaming or betting on the sides or hands of persons gaming were to be void. Horse-racing is nowhere mentioned in this Act, and as a penal Act, one would have expected it to receive a strict construction. It was, however, held in Blaxton v. Pye (1 Will. 309) that this Act did extend to securities given for money lost on bets on horse-races. The Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41, repealed so much of the Act of Anne as made void any note, bill, and mortgage given under such circumstances, and rendered such securities voidable only, enacting that such securities should not be deemed void, but to have been given for an illegal consideration. The omission of bonds from the last mentioned Act is noticeable; but in Hawker v. Halliwell (4 W. R. 585, 3 Sm. & Giff. 194) there is a dictum of the Vice-Chancellor to the effect that bonds are within the equity of the Act of Will. 4, the preamble of which includes securities of every kind, and the reason given for the omission of the word "bonds" is, that the object of the Act being to give a remedy at law to bond fide holders without notice, who can sue in their own names, it was needless to include bonds, because a bond can only be sued on by the holder in the name of the obligee. The distinction between a void bond and a bond given for an illegal consideration is material (Gye v. Felton, 4 Taunt. 876).

The Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, now in force, repeals 16 Car. 2, c. 7, and so much of 9 Anne, c. 14, 11 Anne (I) (the Irish Act) as was not repealed by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41, and by section 18 (1) declares the contract for the bet void; (2) prevents the winner from bringing his action to recover the amount of the bet from the loser; and (3) prevents the winner from suing the stakeholder. Since this statute betting is not illegal, and may be practised to any extent without any penalty being incurred.

In Hill v. Fox (7 W. R. 263, 4 H. & N. 359) the defendant had lost bets to the plaintiff on the result of a horse-race, and he applied to the plaintiff to lend him £2,000. The plaintiff lent him that sum upon the security of a deed, whereby the defendant covenanted to pay the sum lent and assigned certain policies as a security. The plaintiff afterwards brought his action on the covenant, to which the defendant pleaded that part of the consideration was a gaming debt, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the judge had rightly directed the jury that, if they thought the deed was given in pursuance of an agreement that the plaintiff should be paid out of the money, then the deed was void; secus if there was no such agreement, and the plaintiff advanced the money for the defendant to dispose of as he pleased, though plaintiff expected to be paid out of the sum so lent. These contracts cannot be sued on, but they are not illegal. In Rosewarne v. Billing (12 W. R. 104) the Court of Common Pleas held, on the authority of Jessop v. Lutwyche (10 Ex. 614), and Knight v. Cambers (15 C. B. 562), that where a man has lost a bet to another, and he requests a third person to pay it for him, and he does so, the party so paying can sue for the money. Bubb v. Yelverton was decided solely on the ground that the forbearance of the Marquis of Hastings' ring creditors, and consequent avoidance of being posted as a defaulter and turned out of the Jockey Club, was a sufficient consideration for the bond. Had it been necessary to decide whether the bond was good under the Act or not, the decision would probably, on the authority of the foregoing cases, have been in the affirmative, unless the Court should have been of opinion that the transaction was colourable.

HUSBAND OF CESTUI QUE TRUST APPOINTED NEW TRUSTEE.

Re Hattatt's Trusts, M. R., 18 W. R. 416.

It is often so difficult to find a person who is fit and will consent to be appointed a new trustee, that we call attention to this case. The proposed trustee in the case before us was the husband of one of the cestui que trusts. The Master of the Rolls will not in general appoint a person nearly connected with the cestui que trusts (Wilding v. Bolden, 21 Beav. 222), for the reason that the closer the connection between trustee and cestui que trust the more likely is it that the trustee will be induced to commit a breach of trust. But in the present case, the cestui que trusts being all of age, and consenting, the husband was appointed on his undertaking, if he should become sole trustee, to apply forthwith for the appointment of a new trustee to act with him, who must, of course, be one unconnected with the family.

COMMON LAW.

EVIDENCE TO EXPLAIN WILL—CONSTRUCTION—"MY NEPHEW, JOSEPH GRANT."

Grant v. Grant, C.P., 18 W. R. 576.

The point in this case has already been decided by Lord Penzance in the Court of Probate, but it came before the Court of Common Pleas in the form of an action of ejectment, and the question was again argued, and the decision was the same as that given by Lord Penzance.

The question was as to the admissibility of verbal evidence to explain a will. A testator had devised land to and named as his executor "my nephew, Joseph Grant." At the testator's death there was the plaintiff, Joseph Grant, the son of a brother of the testator, and the defendant Joseph Grant, who was the son of a brother of the testator's wife. The plaintiff argued that evidence was not admissible to show that by "my nephew" the testator meant his wife's nephew.

Lord Penzance held that this evidence was admissible, on the ground that the word "nephew" in popular use is often employed to designate a son of a wife's brother or sister, and that there was consequently a latent ambiguity in the will which might be removed by verbal evidence, and that such evidence merely explained, and did not contradict, the will.

The Court of Common Pleas have now decided the same way and upon the same grounds. They have, however, also added another reason. They held the evidence to be admissible, not only because in its popular meaning the word "nephew" applies to a son of a wife's brother, but also because the testator was found to have been in the habit of calling the defendant his nephew. They say, "We are of opinion that evidence may be given of a testator having been in the habit of using expressions in a particular sense," and as "it distinctly appears from the case that the testator was in the habit of calling the defendant his nephew, and as his name was Joseph Grant, he would in this view also answer the description in the testator's will of 'my nephew, Joseph Grant.'"

The salary of the stipendiary magistracy of the Potteries district, which has become vacant by the appointment of Mr. J. E. Davis to be stipendiary magistrate of Sheffield, has hitherto been £300 a year; but an amended Act is now being applied for, in which power is given to raise it to £1,000 per annum.

COURTS.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

May 20. — Weir v. Freshfield.

This was an appeal from the Lords Justices affirming a decision of the Master of the Rolls. The object of the suit was to set aside a deed of compromise under which a breach of trust (consequent on the change of a fund from the Three per cent. Consols into Navy Five per cent. annuities which were subsequently reduced to Three per cent. annuities) had been made good out of another fund settled on trusts in favour of the aunts of the appellant.

The defendant to the bill was the late Mr. Freshfield, solicitor (Freshfields & Newman), who, it was alleged, had obtained the compromise by keeping back certain particulars from the appellant.

Appellant in person.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (without calling on the respondent) said the appeal must be dismissed with costs. He had never seen a more frivolous complaint of fraud, and regretted that such charges should have been made so lightly.

Lord CAIRNS said he had never seen an appeal which appeared to be more unfounded, and he could only express great regret that it should have been brought before their Lordships.

COUNTY COURTS.

LAMBETH.

N.B.—The case of Dover v. Reed, reported by us ante p. 593, was heard by Mr. Cust, the Deputy-Judge, and not by Mr. Pitt Taylor.

APPOINTMENTS.

We announced in our last issue the retirement from the profession of Mr. Wm. H. G. Jones, who had for many years carried on business as a solicitor, in Crosby-square, City. We are requested to state that the practice will still be continued in Crosby-square by Mr. Wm. H. Gatty Jones, the son of the above-named gentleman, who has succeeded his father.

Mr. GORDON WHITEHEAD, barrister-at-law, has been appointed Judge of the Clerkenwell County Court (Circuit No. 41), in succession to the late Mr. H. R. Bagshawe, Q.C. Mr. Whitehead was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1836; he was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in January, 1840, and has practised at the Chancery bar for many years. In 1868 he was appointed principal secretary to the present Lord Chancellor.

Mr. ATHELSTAN HARVEY BOYS, solicitor, of Margate, has been appointed Coroner of that borough, in succession to his father, Mr. J. H. Boys, who has resigned on account of ill-health. Mr. A. H. Boys was certificated in Michaelmas Term, 1861, and is also clerk to the Cinque Ports and borough justices.

Mr. WILLIAM HARVEY WHISTON, solicitor, of Derby, has been appointed Deputy Coroner for the county of Derby. His partner, Mr. William Whiston, is the Coroner. Mr. W. H. Whiston was certificated in 1866.

Mr. JOHN BLICK, solicitor, of Droitwich, Worcestershire, has been appointed Clerk to the county magistrates for the Droitwich petty sessional division, which office was rendered vacant by the resignation of Mr. John Curtler.

Mr. GEORGE EDWARD SHARLAND, solicitor, of Gravesend, and Town Clerk of that borough, has been appointed (by Mr. J. J. Lonsdale, County Court Judge), to be Registrar of the Gravesend County Court, in succession to the late Mr. F. Southgate. Mr. Sharland was certificated 1839, and, besides the Town Clerkship, he holds the office of Clerk of the Peace.

Mr. CLEMENT TAYLOR, solicitor, of Norwich, has been appointed (by Sir R. J. Buxton, High Sheriff of Norfolk), to be Under-Sheriff for the county, in succession to Mr. Henry Haffill, deceased. Mr. Taylor was certificated in 1839.

Mr. DAVID WARD, solicitor, of King's Lynn, Norfolk, has been appointed Clerk to the Commissioners of Sewers for the Fens and Lowlands in the county of Norfolk. Mr. Ward was admitted in 1858, and is also clerk to the borough justices, and to the Commissioners of Taxes for the Lynn district.

Mr. JAMES BRYCE has been appointed Professor of Civil Laws in the University of Oxford, in the place of Sir Travers Twiss, her Majesty's Advocate-General, resigned.

Mr. JOHN PHILIP GREEN, of the Bombay bar, has been appointed to act as a Puisne Judge of the High Court of Bombay, during the absence of Sir Charles Sargent, who has obtained leave of absence for twelve months.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NONSUITS IN THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—Speaking from my own experience I should say that the question whether a plaintiff is to be nonsuited or judgment is to be entered for the defendant, depends in most cases on the judge. When the plaintiff is represented by an attorney, it is, of course, left to the attorney to decide which course he will elect to take, as a plaintiff cannot be nonsuited against his will. But in cases where the plaintiff has no professional adviser, the judge has to act as his counsel and decide the point for him. If the action is a trumpery or improper action, and breaks down on the merits, the judge will probably think it for the interest of the plaintiff to submit to a judgment, so as to put an end to the litigation. If, however, he thinks it a case where the plaintiff ought to have another opportunity of trying his rights, as for example, in cases of ejectment where the plaintiff's case fails from defect of evidence—he will probably direct a nonsuit to be entered.

A COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

FICTITIOUS LAW FIRMS.

Sir,—Is there not some power vested in the Incorporated Law Society or elsewhere, whereby an attorney may be restrained from adding the mysterious words "and company" to his signature and door-plate, when it is well known that there is not any admitted attorney in his office or associated with him in business? I need not specify the dangers and the scandals which may result to the public and to the profession from this most reprehensible procedure, now that the new Bankruptcy Act is in operation, and that class of practitioners who formerly attended to the under-current of bankruptcy business are at large and at liberty to coalesce openly with those dangerous classes who so freely plundered insolvent estates under the old laws of bankruptcy and insolvency.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

Sir,—As in two successive issues of your valuable paper you have coupled with your approval of the proposed alteration in the existing law the expression of your opinion that the change should not comprise a retrospective enactment, permit me to recall the fact that Lord Lyndhurst's Act of 1835, which for the first time specially prohibited these alliances, had a retrospective operation, its primary object being in fact to legitimise the present Duke of Beaufort.

But on general grounds, would it not be an anomaly if a Legislature, pronouncing these marriages to be not contrary to the law of God and, therefore, not to be forbidden by the law of man, should refuse to legalise them in the past?—particularly when it is remembered that their positive illegality (notwithstanding Lord Lyndhurst's Act) was not established till the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Brook v. Brook in 1861, prior to which it was the opinion of several of the most eminent lawyers that the lex loci contractus would apply to such marriages contracted abroad.

A penalty may be inflicted for a broken law, but not in respect of a law condemned by conscience, public opinion, and subsequent legislation; and in this instance it is not so much on the offending parents as on the innocent offspring that the penalty would fall.

For the above reasons, while cordially agreeing with you in thinking that the time has arrived when this unwarranted restriction—the history of which is a disgrace to our legislation—should be removed, I venture respectfully to differ from you in this respect, that I think it is a clear case for making the Act retrospective to 1835, with all proper provisions, of course, for saving vested and contingent rights.

J. W. H.

[We hold that marriage with a deceased wife's sister ought not to be forbidden for the future; but since it has, in fact, been forbidden in the past, we consider that the line should be drawn at the date of the amending Act. We believe that the upholding and enforcing the sanctions of the law so long as they exist, is conducive not only to the due respect of our laws generally, but to the amendment of such as stand in need of alteration; and we disapprove of anything tending to tempt people to overdraw their accounts with the law in the hope that afterwards the Legislature may interpose to wipe out the score.—ED. S. J.]

MARRIED WOMEN'S SEPARATE ESTATE.

Sir,—Will any of your correspondents answer the following question?

A married woman living apart from her husband (not by deed or any legal separation), and having separate settled estate, but without power of anticipation, wishes to borrow money, and can procure two sureties who will unite with her in a joint and several bond.

Is there any objection to such a loan, and if so will you refer to a case or authority on the point?

STAMP DUTY ON LEASES BILL.

Sir,—We are informed at the Stamp Office that all leases granted in consideration of previous repairs (though properly repairs are distinct from improvements) are considered subject to the thirty-five shilling duty. We think it worth while to call attention to this while the bill is awaiting committee, for, if it passes as it stands, all such leases (and they are almost universal on London estates) may require the extra ten shilling stamp. Indeed "improvements," substantial or otherwise, is a very vague and objectionable expression, and might or might not apply to the most ordinary covenants. It would be far better either to abolish the duty altogether, or to say plainly that draft leases shall be subject to it.

SCADDING & SON.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

May 20.—Colonial Judges.—Earl Gray presented a petition from Singapore, praying for greater security of judicial independence. It was not a matter of complaint that the judges were removable by the Secretary of State, but that the Governors should have the power of suspending them.—Earl Granville explained that in cases both of removals and suspensions there was almost always a hearing before the Privy Council. Being desirous of getting the best advice on this subject, he had sought and obtained a memorandum from the Privy Council. He cited the following opinion of Dr. Lushington, given in that memorandum:—"I entertain no doubt in my own mind that the most efficacious means of proceeding, and productive of the least evil consequences, is that the governors of the colonies respectively should be entrusted with the power of investigating any alleged charges against the judges, and, if in their opinion need be, of suspending them; of course all the proceedings, and the evidence upon which they act, should be remitted without delay to the Colonial Office, and, if need be, her Majesty will be advised to remit the case to the consideration of the Privy Council. I apprehend that the Judicial Committee has no peculiar claim to take cognizance of such a case. I think that the propriety of the colonial governor being invested with this power, great as it is, would be more apparent if contrasted with any other mode of proceeding than that suggested."

The Poor Relief Metropolis Bill was read a second time.

May 23.—The Greek Massacre.—Lord Carnarvon called attention to this subject, and Earl Clarendon said that until the inquiry now in progress was finished the Government could not decide on their action. Every precaution would be taken to prevent a failure of justice.

The Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Bill.—The Marquis of Salisbury moved the second reading.—Lord

Cairns said that the principle of the bill might be applied with advantage to large classes of business transactions, and in operation it would be beneficial to the public as well as to solicitors; but whether it should be applied to all classes of business was a question that might very well be discussed in committee.—The Lord Chancellor said there were clauses of the bill which would require careful consideration, and he pointed them out to the promoters when he was asked by them to support the bill as a whole. The points raised were matters for consideration in committee, and he saw no reason why the bill should not be read a second time.—The bill was then read a second time.

The Poor Relief (Metropolis) Bill passed through committee.

The Railways (Powers and Construction) Bill.—The Earl of Kimberley moved the second reading of the bill. It related to the power of the Board of Trade in making orders for the construction of railways, for the extension of time, and for internal management. The proviso that those orders should not be enforced unless the landowners were all consenting parties would be retained, but at present great inconvenience arose from the proviso that if a railway or canal company lodged notice of opposition the Board should suspend further proceedings. The bill, therefore, proposed that, notwithstanding such notice, the Board should have power to examine into the matter, and make a provisional order thereupon, which would come before Parliament, like fishery, pier, and harbour orders, for confirmation. This procedure was only resorted to in the case of small lines, where the expense of a private bill could not be borne. The bill also enabled the Board to permit deviations from the broad or narrow gauge at present obligatory, for in short lines with steep gradients a narrower gauge might be expedient.—The bill was read a second time.

The Norwich Voters' Disfranchisement Bill was read a second time.

The Irish Church Act (1869) Amendment Bill (by Lord Redesdale) was withdrawn.

The Poor Relief (Metropolis) Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

May 20.—The Privilege of Ambassadors—The Greek Massacre.—Sir R. Palmer said there was an undertaking given to all other countries by all states pretending to civilisation that the principles of civilised government should be bona fide and effectively established for the protection of foreign travellers, and more especially that foreigners should be protected from being the subjects of exceptional outrage because they were foreigners, and because they were persons travelling in the enjoyment or expected enjoyment of the hospitality of a friendly state. But ambassadors were a class with respect to whom principles of even more universal importance applied. The principles on which that part of the public law was founded were so sacred and so important for all the communications of nations, that no nation held a higher duty, either to itself or to other nations, than to vindicate them upon every proper occasion, and their application in this particular case was exceedingly plain. The doctrine of inviolability of ambassadors applied to all those who were members of the legation of which ambassadors and ministers were at the head, and the secretaries in this case partook in the fullest degree of the right of protection which belonged to that character. He cited Vattel. The inevitable conclusion was—first, that if from a failure in the performance of the general obligation of protecting foreigners a blow fell on those for whom the faith not of the sovereign merely but of the whole nation was specially pledged, that was an aggravation, a difference in kind as well as in degree, of crime, which would under any circumstances have been committed, and a great aggravation on the part of the state that neglected those precautions and those duties of government which ought to have been sufficient to shield even the meanest subject of a foreign state from such an outrage. Also if any subject of a state to which the ambassador was credited had offered any violence, indignity, or wrong to that ambassador, it became the imperative duty of the state to use all its resources, and not to abstain from any means whatever which could possibly be used to deliver the person to whom the public faith was so solemnly pledged from the condition of jeopardy in which by such outrage he was placed. This doctrine did not mean that the state to which the ambassador came guaranteed him against all the ordinary occurrences of life; but that the faith of the nation was pledged to him to give him every possible protection against wrong or outrage, and to give him redress, and to deliver him if that wrong had been done. In this case they had to deal with an outrage of a most extraordinary and shocking kind upon British subjects entitled to the protection of a friendly state, and not having received in due measure that protection, an outrage perpetrated under unprecedented circumstances upon those to whom the public faith of the Greek nation was absolutely pledged, and to assist whom they should not have omitted to do anything that could by any human possibility have been done on the part of that nation, and the people and government of that country. It was perfectly plain that, by the exercise of a little sound judgment and common sense the lives of those gentlemen might have been saved. The enormous ransom demanded—£25,000—would have been paid; and he wished the Greek Government had at once intimated their readiness to pay the money, for that they would have to pay it in the end was a matter beyond all doubt. After going in detail through the facts, he concluded by asking whether the Government were able to state to the House what measures had been or would be taken to obtain from the Greek Government such satisfaction for this unprecedented outrage as her Majesty was entitled to claim according to the law of nations, and to insure due protection for the future for the lives of the diplomatic servants and other subjects of the British Crown within the kingdom of Greece.—Mr. Gladstone agreed generally in the principles laid down by Sir Roundell Palmer, though their application must be governed by information not yet received by the Government. No municipal law could excuse a failure in international law. It would be some weeks before the Government could be in full possession of the facts, and it would then be their duty to consider what line they should take, not only as an aggrieved party, but as one of the Protecting Powers.

May 23.—The University Tests Bill.—The second reading was carried by a majority of 191 to 66.

The Irish Land Bill (Committee).—A clause by Mr. Bruen, intended to facilitate the ascertainment of the amount of compensation to be paid by the landlord in the event of a claim being made for it by the tenant, was negatived by a majority of 207 to 103.—Mr. Downing proposed the following clause.—“Where a person shall be in possession of a holding at the time of the passing of this Act, of which he or the persons from whom he derived had been tenant from year to year, and whose tenancy had been determined on the 25th day of March or 1st day of May last by notice to quit served by his landlord, he may claim compensation under this bill as if he was a tenant about to quit his holding, and the Court may in its discretion hear and determine the claim accordingly.” The clause was negatived.—Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens proposed a clause giving to a judge of the Landed Estates Court power to make agreements and leases for thirty-one years in cases where a receiver should have been appointed pending a sale; and also giving a similar power to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in all cases in lunacy, and in all minor matters where a receiver should have been appointed and there was no petition for a sale. The clause was negatived.—Mr. Bryan moved an amendment to provide that no notice to quit should be valid unless served with the sanction and by the officers of the Civil Bill Court, and that the Court, before giving its sanction with respect to such notice, should consider all the equities that might be advanced by each party. The amendment was negatived.—A clause by Mr. M'Mahon repealing section 52 of the Landlord and Tenant Law Amendment (Ireland) Act, 1860, was negatived.—A clause by Mr. W. Ormsby Gore, to the effect that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue should provide dies for denoting either by impressed or adhesive stamps the value of the notice to quit, was negatived by a majority of 210 to 77.—Mr. Gregory moved, but withdrew, a clause providing for the publication in the Dublin Gazette of notices to quit within two calendar months after service.—Mr. Pollard-Urquhart obtained the insertion of a clause exempting from liability to rent any land contained in public roads.—A clause by Mr. Pim abolishing the right of distress for recovery of rent, and also the landlord's priority in the case of goods taken in execution, was negatived. The report of amendments was then agreed to.

The Gas and Water Facilities Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Sligo and Cashel Disfranchisement Bill was read a first time.

May 24.—The Established Church in Wales.—Mr. Watkin Williams moved:—"That, in the opinion of this House, it is right that the Establishment of the Church and its union with the State should cease to exist in the said Dominion and Principality; that it is just and expedient that the public endowments enjoyed by the Church Establishment should, after making provision for all vested interests, be applied to the support of a national and undenominational system of education for the said Dominion and Principality of Wales." He gave a lengthy pedigree of the Welsh Church, and maintained it had had a separate origin from, and had been much purer than, the English, to which it was united by fraud and violence, temp. Henry VIII. The Nonconformists were now five to one, and judging from the time of legislation and the tone of ministers, he thought the time had come when justice, equity and equality would be considered in that great assembly.—Mr. Gladstone said the case of the Irish Church was a widely different one. The numerical disparity was far greater, and the doctrinal difference so great as to bear no comparison. The Welsh had held stoutly to their Church as long as it was administered in accordance with their national feelings, and in that respect a wholesome reform was going on. The attack, of course, was really against the Church of England at large, and the Government were not prepared to enter on any crusade of the kind.—Mr. Osborne Morgan supported the resolution, which was negatived by a majority of 209 to 45.

Horse Racing.—Mr. T. Hughes introduced a bill to amend the law. The first reading was carried by a majority of 132 to 44.

The Married Women's Property Bill (No. 1) passed through committee with amendments.

May 25.—The Clerical Disabilities Bill.—Mr. Hibbert moved the second reading. The principle of the bill was that a clergyman who desired to relinquish his calling might, on giving notice to his bishop and executing a deed in chancery, be relieved after six months from his disabilities, and also lose the privileges to which, as a clergyman, he might be entitled, and become, in fact, a layman.—Mr. J. Lewis, in seconding the motion, said it would be very objectionable to admit to the House clergymen who continued to hold their livings. But the bill altogether excluded beneficed clergymen from the House. He supported the measure as going in a liberal direction, and tending to do away with a separate ecclesiastical class.—Mr. Walpole said it was extremely undesirable that persons who took holy orders should do so lightly, unadvisedly, or as an experimental matter. Secondly, when a person had once entered into holy orders, and had served in that sacred character, there might be reasons which no doubt might induce him to take up some other calling, but if he did so he ought not to be chopping and changing about. He did not wish to see the services of ministers of religion acquire more or less of a professional character according to the profits or advantages of the experiments they might make. He had no doubt that the complaint was well founded that by the law of the land—excepting the Act of 41 Geo. 3—there was nothing whatever to prevent an unbeneficed clergyman from taking part in the business of the House of Commons any more than clerical peers from taking part in the business of the House of Lords. To that he did not object; but it was very unadvisable that a beneficed clergyman should come into that House, because he was bound to give all his time, and his whole life, to the duties of his profession. With regard to municipal disabilities, he could see no reason why an unbeneficed clergyman should not be a member of a civil corporation. He believed, however, that a simple repeal of the Act of George 3, guarded, at the same time, by certain limits and restrictions, would be a better course than the passing of a measure which might give clergymen encouragement to go into some other calling. These were the reasons which induced him to say that the Government ought to watch this bill with considerable care.—Sir L. Palk said a more objectionable measure had never been introduced.—Mr. Beresford Hope did not think the bill a complete, broad, and fair measure of relief. While it paid infinite regard to the case of those clergymen who from conscientious scruples did not wish to continue to be clergymen, it overlooked the case of those who, from family circumstances, had since they took holy orders been placed in a social position carrying with it duties and responsibilities of citizenship which they felt themselves to be under the most sacred moral obligations to fulfil. He referred to a class of men who were the heads of families, the stewards and dispensers of a large property, and who would feel a great and natural repugnance to forego their position as clergymen capable of performing voluntary pastoral duties. While continuing to be clergymen they were fit to be leaders of men, legislators, and municipal officers. He preferred that, without attempting to deal with holy orders, they should simply give relief from civil disabilities, extending that relief freely and impartially to all. There should be some provision enabling those who left the church from conscientious scruples to return to it.—Mr. Bouverie said the bill was superior to his own bill introduced in 1849 and 1862.—Mr. Henley said, could anything be worse for the position of the clergyman than that he should be allowed to put off his sacred office for one six months and resume it the following six months, and so on alternately? The bill would, perhaps, satisfy the wishes of a few persons who were anxious to be relieved of the disabilities under which they at present laboured, but it would also enable persons possessing the power and the privileges derived from an episcopal ordination to leave the community from whom they had obtained that power and those privileges, and to turn those advantages to account in attempting to overthrow the church from which they derived them, and from which they had withdrawn. He should vote against the bill.—Mr. Bruce said that the recommendation of the bill was that under it this step could not be taken without a very solemn form being gone through, or without the lapse of considerable time. It was provided in the bill that the clergyman should only be permitted to resume his sacred office by a solemn act, and even then not at his own will and pleasure, but after the question had been fully considered by his archbishop, to whom the bill gave a discretionary power to restore the clergyman if he should think fit. The plan proposed by the bill was better than Mr. Beresford Hope's. He saw no objection to the bill being extended so as to include colonial bishops.—Mr. Cross opposed the bill.—The second reading was carried by a majority of 137 to 56.

The Game Laws Abolition Bill.—Mr. P. Taylor moved the second reading.—Debate adjourned.

Joint-Stock Companies Arrangements.—A bill by Mr. H. B. Sheridan to facilitate compromises and arrangements between creditors and shareholders of joint stock companies in liquidation was read a first time.

May 26.—The Irish Land Bill (consideration of the bill as amended).—Sir F. Heygate moved that the bill be recommitted for the purpose of introducing a clause fixing the increased amount of additional salaries to be paid to the judges and officers of the Civil Bill Courts in Ireland for the additional duties imposed on them by this measure. The motion being opposed by the Government was ultimately withdrawn on the understanding that these salaries should be fixed by statute when the data should have been ascertained.—Mr. Chichester Fortescue added three new clauses to provide that resumption of lands for building labourers' cottages shall not be deemed disturbance; that county cess levied as compensation for outrages under the Peace Preservation Act shall not be halved between landlord and tenant; and to abolish distress for rent under future tenancies, except where the right may be reserved by written agreement between landlord and tenant.—Several clauses, moved by Mr. Gregory, laying down certain conditions for the erection of labourers' cottages, were objected to by the Government, but Mr. Gladstone offered to accept the first two, which provided that the occupier shall apply to the landlord before building, and shall not be at liberty to build if the landlord consents to do the work himself.—Mr. Gregory declined this compromise. The whole of the clauses were, on a division, negatived by a majority of 59 to 42. A proviso was afterwards added by Mr. C. Fortescue embodying the Government compromise.—Mr. Chichester Fortescue, in accordance with his promise to Mr. Pell, proposed a proviso to define the reclamation of land, which is coupled with permanent buildings as reclamation of waste land. The proviso was carried by a majority of 155 to 17. Clause 14 (Equities clause) was amended by Sir R. Palmer, who added a proviso debarring from compensation a tenant whose landlord has offered to continue his tenancy on reasonable terms which he has unreasonably refused.—

Clause 61 was struck out on Mr. Chichester Fortescue's motion.—Mr. Charley moved to strike out clause 62, which partitions the county cess between landlord and tenant; but it was retained, on a division, by a majority of 201 to 74.—Some formal amendments having been made, the third reading was fixed for Monday.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE BILL.

The following petition, was presented to the House of Lords by the Lord Chancellor on the 23rd inst:—

The humble petition of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association:

Sheweth—That on the appointment by her Majesty on the 18th September, 1867, of commissioners to inquire into the operation and effect of the present constitution of the several courts of law and equity in England, your petitioners took a lively interest in such inquiry, and after earnest consideration of the subjects so referred, joined with the Council of the Incorporated Law Society in making various suggestions to the Royal Commissioners, and especially expressed their opinion that the present separation of jurisdictions was injurious to the suitors, and that one general court ought to be established.

That your petitioners have felt much gratification at the recommendations in this respect made by the Royal Commissioners in their report submitted to her Majesty, and presented to your Right Honourable House.

That your petitioners have observed with great satisfaction that the Lord Chancellor has introduced into your Lordships' Right Honourable House two bills shortly intitled "The High Court of Justice Act, 1870," and "The Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1870," for the purpose of carrying into effect the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners.

That in the judgment of your petitioners it is most essential to the interests of the general community that the proposed abolition of the present distinctions between courts of equity and courts of law should be made without delay, and they respectfully submit to your Lordship that the preparation of a code of procedure for such courts when consolidated may be properly deferred until after the bills now before your Lordships shall have become law, and that it may be safely entrusted to a competent body to be constituted by royal commission or otherwise to prepare such code in concert with, and subject to, the sanction of the judges presiding in the various courts, the proceedings in which the code shall hereafter govern.

Your petitioners therefore most humbly pray that your Lordships' Right Honourable House will not delay to give effect to the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners, but will be pleased to pass, with such amendments as may be necessary or expedient, the said bills for the establishment of a High Court of Justice and a Court of Appellate Jurisdiction.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

OBITUARY.

MR. F. SOUTHGATE.

Mr. Francis Southgate, solicitor, of Gravesend, died at his residence, Woodville-terrace, on the 20th May, in the 79th year of his age. He was certificated in 1819 and had been a resident at Gravesend for the last sixty years. Besides holding the magistracy of the county court, he had for many years been Clerk to the Board of Improvement Commissioners, Clerk to the Guardians of the Gravesend and Milton Union, Vestry Clerk of Northfleet and Milton parishes, and Superintendent Registrar of Births, &c. He was also Clerk to the Union Assessment Committee, and to the Turnpike Trustees, and Secretary to the Waterworks and Gaslight Companies, and several local charities.

MR. J. CLAPTON.

Mr. Jeremiah Clapton, formerly a solicitor, and an alderman of Stamford, Lincolnshire, died on the 2nd of May, at the age of seventy-five years. He had been clerk to the Stamford Board of Guardians since the first operation of the Poor Law Act in 1835; he was elected to the Town Council as an Alderman in 1856, and served the office of Mayor in 1867-8. He acted for many years as an election agent in the Conservative interest, and in that capacity he assisted in the return of Colonel Chaplin, the present Duke of Rutland, Sir George Clerk, the Right Hon. J. C. Herries, Lord Chelmsford (then Sir F. Thesiger), the present Marquis of Salisbury, the Right Hon. J. Inglis (now of the Scotch Bench), Sir Stafford Northcote, and Sir J. D. Hay.

THE COMMON LAW JUDGES ON THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE BILL AND THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL.

The following are the communications which have been addressed by the Lord Chief Justice of England and other judges to the Lord Chancellor with respect to the High Court of Justice and Appellate Jurisdiction Bills:—

"Court of Queen's Bench, May 13, 1870.

"My Lord,—I have the honour to inform your Lordship that in consequence of what you were reported to have said in the recent debate in the House of Lords, as to having received from the judges, with a limited exception, no suggestions on the bills relating to the High Court of Justice and High Court of Appeal, introduced into Parliament by your Lordship, the judges have met and given their careful attention to the bills in question, and have embodied their views in the shape of resolutions.

"Before setting out these resolutions I must premise that owing to the shortness of the time—it being understood that the bills would be proceeded with in the House of Lords on Monday next, the 16th inst.—and also the great pressure of judicial business, the judges have only been able to deal with the more prominent and salient parts of these bills, omitting mere matters of detail, as to some of which, relating to the High Court of Justice Bill, they may think it necessary to trouble your Lordship on a future occasion.

"I. That it appears to the judges that, while it is highly desirable that the distinction between law and equity now existing in respect of civil rights shall be done away with, and that in civil suits and actions one law shall be administered, it is essentially necessary, in order to prevent confusion in the future administration of justice, that, instead of a general enactment, such as is now contained in clause 13 of the High Court of Justice Bill, a careful collation of the common law and equity law having been first made, express provision shall be made as to what the law shall be in each particular instance; or, if this course should be deemed impracticable, owing to the time it would require, that clauses should be carefully framed expressly stating the principles determined on by Parliament for the purpose in view.

"II. That while the courts of common law should be required to administer the law as thus altered and settled, in civil suits it is wholly unnecessary, and, on the contrary, eminently undesirable, that their constitutions or peculiar jurisdictions in other matters should be in any way interfered with. That this applies to the peculiar jurisdiction of each of the three courts, but more particularly to the prerogative and Crown jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench.

"III. That the names and titles of the courts and judges should remain the same as at present, any change herein being neither necessary nor desirable. That no power, therefore, should be conferred by the bill to make any alteration in this respect.

"IV. That while the judges are agreed that subordinate rules of procedure and rules of practice may be left to be settled hereafter, they are of opinion that, looking to the great and substantial difference which exists between the procedure of the equity and the common law courts, the more important matters of procedure ought to be considered and determined by Parliament, and should form part of the bill.

"That herein they include not only the system of pleading to be adopted, but also more especially the important question of trial by jury and the examination of witnesses in open court. Looking upon these questions as of vital importance to the administration of justice on the trial of disputed questions of facts in general, while they readily admit that there are certain classes of cases in which the common law form of trial is inappropriate, or at all events may be dispensed with, the judges submit that certain fixed guiding principles and rules should, after due consideration, be embodied in the bill, instead of being left to be decided upon hereafter.

"That the power of making rules in respect of all matters of procedure not provided for by the bill should be left to the equity and common law judges united in the High Court of Justice.

"That it is highly expedient and desirable that, after the first rules of procedure and practice shall have been framed and established, a power should be vested in the High Court of altering and modifying the procedure and practice from time to time as occasion may require, subject always to any orders and rules made for such purpose being laid before Parliament within a fixed time.

"V. That the judges are of opinion that the powers proposed to be given by the 16th clause of the bill to ministers of the Crown and to persons unnamed are wholly unconstitutional, as being contrary to the principle that the judicature should be in all respects independent of the Executive; and they earnestly deprecate any power being vested in any person or body of persons, other than the High Court, to make or alter the law relating to the constitution, procedure or practice of the Court.

"VI. That, with a view to the exercise of the powers referred to in paragraph 4, and of the powers originally proposed to be vested in the High Court of Justice, the judges willingly concur in the combination of courts of common law and equity into one common court. But if such powers are to be withheld and transferred elsewhere, as is proposed in the bill as altered, the constituting of such a court appears to them useless and unnecessary."

"The foregoing resolutions were agreed to unanimously by the assembled body of judges, being sixteen in number, with the exception of the second, as to which Baron Bramwell and Mr. Justice Smith declined to express any opinion, while Mr. Justice Blackburn and Mr. Justice Hannen expressed their opinion as to the matters referred to in the second and third resolutions in the following terms:—

"We are not quite prepared to agree in these two resolutions, but we agree that no alteration in the names or titles, or in the constitution or peculiar jurisdictions of the courts of common law, is required for the purpose of enabling these courts to administer the law as proposed to be altered; and we are of opinion that it is very undesirable that any such alterations should be made, unless with carefully considered provisions (to be contained in the Act) to secure that the substance of what is now done by the peculiar jurisdiction of the courts be not altered or destroyed by the change. This, we think, is not done in the present bill."

"Mr. Justice Willes, not having attended the meeting of the judges at which the foregoing resolutions were passed, transmitted his views in a written paper, which I forward herewith.

"I have further to state that as regards the appellate jurisdiction and the constitution of the High Court of Appeal, at a further meeting of fourteen of the judges it was resolved by twelve judges—the two others, Mr. Justice Blackburn and Mr. Justice Smith, declining to express any opinion—that until the whole appellate jurisdiction, including that of the House of Lords and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, shall be dealt with, the amount of arrears in the latter being of a most formidable description, it will be impossible for the judges to offer any opinion or recommendation which shall be satisfactory to their minds.

"I have, &c., "A. E. COCKBURN.

"The Right Hon. the Lord Chancellor."

"Separate Memorandum of Mr. Justice Willes, expressing his own Views.—High Court of Justice Bill.

"It appears to the undersigned that the general scope of this measure is highly beneficial, as bringing the judges of all the superior courts together into one great body for the administration of justice. The bill, as originally framed upon the recommendations of the Judicature Commission, took the best advantage of this proposed change by not merely combining the courts in name, but also conferring upon the judges powers (which, like those given to the election judges by the Parliamentary Election Act, 1868, s. 25, ought to have the force of statute) to work out the scheme by making rules of practice and procedure for the government of the court and its branches. The result would have been a thorough administration of justice in each suit, so that a suitor, instead of being dismissed unheard because he had found his way into the wrong court, would be referred to the appropriate division. Another and by no means trifling advantage would be that wherever the distribution of business at present attributable to the peculiar functions of the several courts—as, for instance, Crown business to the Queen's Bench, registration and election to the Common Pleas, and revenue to the Exchequer—represents a convenient and economical division of labour, not involving conflict of jurisdiction, such distribution would for its obvious usefulness be retained. Details of this kind would assuredly be best arranged by the judges, with such assistance under their control as the additional temporary labour of framing rules might be found to require.

"In its present shape, however, as amended, the bill brings the courts nominally indeed together, but places the judges at arm's length; for, instead of authorising them to frame common rules for their united court and its different divisions, the bill subjects them all (more especially by clause 16), as to their procedure, order of business, times of sitting, and even the manner in which they are to give judgment, and the form in which their decisions are to be reported, to the control of the Privy Council—a course, it is believed, without constitutional precedent, and injurious to the independence and efficiency of the judges. Save in the exercise of extraordinary powers of the Crown, such interposition of the Privy Council is unnecessary and impolitic. The representation of the Crown in the ordinary prerogative of justice is confined to the judges, subject only to the Legislature. Like remarks arise upon the High Court of Appeal Bill. Moreover, it does not provide for either abolishing or speeding and cheapening appeals to the House of Lords.

"The bills as originally presented seem to the undersigned substantially unobjectionable from the point of view of the Judicature Commission Report. J. S. WILLES."

LAW DIGEST COMMISSION.

A second report by the Digest of the Law Commission has just been printed. The Commissioners say:—

"In our first report we explained the grounds for our opinion that a digest of law is expedient; we stated that it would require a considerable expenditure of time and money, and would involve the appointment of a Commission or body for executing the work; but in order to avoid an immediate outlay on a large scale, we recommended that small portions of the digest, as specimens of the whole work, should, in the first instance, be prepared; and we humbly submitted that powers should be given us to carry this purpose into effect.

"We were accordingly empowered by your Majesty's Government to take the steps necessary for the preparation, under our superintendence, of some specimens or samples of a digest such as we had indicated in our report. For this purpose we selected three subjects—namely, bills of exchange, mortgages, and easements, and we obtained the services of three gentlemen at the bar, each of whom was directed to frame the draught of a digest of the law on one of these subjects. The gentlemen whose assistance we have had have laid before us materials of considerable value, and have enabled us to form conclusions as to the conduct of the entire work. But we think it unadvisable to continue any further this mode of proceeding. We have found that the examination and revision of these materials with that rigorous care and accuracy which would be requisite before we could lay them before your Majesty as specimens of a digest of law, would involve considerable further delay and expense; while, on the other hand, we have satisfied ourselves that these specimens would have again to be revised, and perhaps recast, when the time arrived for inserting them as portions of a complete and systematic work. The experiment, however, has served a useful purpose. It has brought out very clearly the difficulties to be contended with, and the conditions under which the work must be executed. We believe that the materials which have thus been collected may be made use of with advantage in the formation of a general digest of the law, and we are of opinion that the work of a general digest, based on a comprehensive plan, and with a uniform method, should be at once undertaken. A complete digest cannot be executed without the assistance of the most highly skilled persons whose services can be procured; the success of the work will depend on their efficiency; they must give to the undertaking the whole of their time and energy; and it is obvious that the services of such persons, and under such conditions, cannot be obtained without the offer of perma-ment employment and high remuneration. We therefore humbly report to your Majesty our opinion that it is expedient that a body of persons such as we have described, and not exceeding three in number, should be constituted, to be charged with the duty of executing the digest as a whole, being provided with the necessary means and assistance, and acting under such directions and control, either of a committee of your Majesty's Privy Council or otherwise, as to your Majesty shall seem fit."

Mr. Justice Willes reports separately, as follows:—

"I respectfully dissent from the report for the following reason:—Because fully agreeing that a first-rate modern digest of English law is to be desired (for professional use), I think it will, when made, after all be only a makeshift for a code, or rather series of codes. Quite apart from the authority and example of so many other countries, which can hardly all be mistaken, a code is preferable to a digest in many points of view. A digest gathers and compiles what has been decided or deemed, and among other relics it will preserve the conflicts of Common Law and Chancery, and the rest, whereas a code must needs once and for all lay down uniform rules of justice to govern every court. Thus a code will swallow up at once mischiefs of detail, the instances of which would choke a digest. Moreover a digest will be limited to English reports and treatises, and so far as regards affairs peculiarly our own, such as real property, this exclusion of foreign systems may be tolerable enough, but as to mercantile and maritime affairs, there will be so much opportunity for choice and improvement thrown away. It seems even possible that a really well-considered code, not restricted to a digest of our own jurisprudence, but embodying improvements suggested by a comparison in our own laws with those of other countries, might contribute something to a great object—the gradual formation of international mercantile and maritime law. (L. S.) J. S. WILLES."

THE LAND TRANSFER BILL.

The committee of the Bristol Law Library Society have published some observations on this bill, to the following effect:—

1. The committee are in favour of a scheme for the registration of title as distinguished from a registration of assurances, provided a plan can be devised by which such registration can be cheaply and speedily obtained.
2. The committee approve (as a first and tentative measure) of the registration of those persons only who are able to dispose of the fee simple, and they also approve of Part I. of the bill so far as it enables any person capable of disposing of the fee to place his title on the register as proprietor; but they think this part of the bill may be usefully extended. As the bill at present stands, the benefits of registration would only be felt at the end of some twenty or thirty years, and there would be little inducement to go upon the register at all. The committee strongly recommend that a landowner should be at liberty to submit for registration a title commencing from any prior date, and that upon such limited title being approved of by the registrar, registration should confer upon the registered proprietor the power of conveying an estate in fee simple, subject only to the adverse interests which were prior in their creation to the root of title.
3. The committee think that fee farm rents, created by way of use, and, therefore, not originating in tenure (which are very frequent in Bristol and other large towns), should be clearly provided for by the Act, so as to appear upon the register as incumbrances.
4. The committee suggest that proof of receipt of rents and profits in accordance with the title for a reasonable period should always form part of the evidence required from a proprietor prior to registration. (See section 6 of bill.)
5. The committee think that the bill should express much more clearly than it does that the title, which the registered proprietor can confer upon a purchaser, is absolute and indefeasible, subject only to the registered incumbrances, to the charges declared not to be incumbrances, and to such adverse interests, created prior to the registered root of title, as may be still subsisting.
6. The committee call attention to sections 5, 7, 31 and 34, with reference to their effect upon the legal estate. Such shifting about of the legal estate appears to the committee objectionable; and they consider it most undesirable that a registration bill should interfere, more than is absolutely needful, with the existing system of landed estates. By the bill as it now stands, the registration of the title to an estate in strict settlement, with a power of sale to the trustees with the consent of the tenant for life, would confer the legal estate upon the trustees, and place the tenant for life in the position of a mere equitable owner, and deprive him of the power of bringing ejectment or of creating a legal tenancy. This seems to the committee an objectionable interference. They suggest that registration should, in itself confer no estate, but simply a power of conveying the fee simple to a purchaser; and that, if it be thought necessary, the register should distinguish between persons in whom the fee is actually vested and those who have only a power to confer it, the former class being registered as proprietors, the latter as potential owners; but that both classes should stand in precisely the same position as to their power of conferring the fee upon a purchaser.

7. The 29th section of the bill empowers the Court, upon the application of any person interested, to register any other person in the place of a deceased registered proprietor; and a person so registered would, by sections 23 and 24, be able to sell and convey the property to a purchaser. A power of sale would thus be created which the owner never contemplated, and might possibly have objected to. The committee doubt whether the creation of such a power is desirable.

8. The committee are of opinion that some provision is required for indicating upon the register that the registered proprietor has ceased to have the power of conferring the fee.

9. The 16th and following sections appear to the committee to create an entirely new species of mortgage, not conferring on the mortgagee the legal estate, but giving him certain statutory powers analogous to those which a mortgagee now possesses; for instance, a power to enter on the land or into the receipt of the rents and profits (see section 18). These statutory powers appear to the committee to be objectionable, as increasing the liability of tenants and occupiers of land, who would be liable to be proceeded against both by the mortgagee, under his statutory powers, and by the lessor or owner, under the powers now incident to the reversion or legal estate. The committee, whilst not objecting to the principle of registering charges, suggest that the present mode of mortgaging property should be allowed to remain, and that where the mortgage contains a power of sale the mortgagee should be registered as having power to convey in fee, and that in other cases he should either be registered as mortgagee or should be allowed to protect his interest by a caveat.

10. The committee think that no system of registration will be successful unless local registries be established, presided over by registrars of ability and experience, having jurisdiction to decide questions of fact as well as of law; but they think that persons aggrieved by any mistake of a registrar, without fault on their part, should be entitled to compensation out of an indemnity fund to be created for this purpose, or out of the Consolidated Fund.

11. The committee strongly disapprove of compulsory registration.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds, although they have not continued the advance of the week before last, have, on the whole, maintained their ground with firmness, during the week which has now ended. The foreign market has been particularly animated, and railways are firm at slightly improved quotations.

A scheme is out for the reorganisation of the Atlantic and Great Western Railway (America); the line to be foreclosed and sold under the "consolidated mortgage," and bought by General McClellan and others as trustees for those creditors, &c., who embark in the scheme. The funds are to be raised by an issue of bonds in three series.

THE NEW RIVER COMPANY.—On Wednesday last Messrs. Fox & Bousfield sold at the Auction Mart a property of a description which is very rarely in the market. It consisted in the interest of a Miss Horton, recently deceased, in the New River Company. The history of the New River is well known, especially to those who have perused its details in Mr. Smiles' "Lives of the Engineers." When Sir Hugh Middleton first began the undertaking in 1613, the concern was divided into seventy-two shares, of which the King (James I) took one half, the other moiety being divided among Sir Hugh and his friends. It was very many years before the shares ever returned any dividend to their holders, the result of which was that when the shares at last became a paying property, almost all had passed from the hands of the original adventurers. To this day, however, about two whole shares remain the property of certain descendants of Sir Hugh Middleton. The thirty-six "King's shares" were surrendered to the company by Charles II., for an annuity of £500, the Royal spendthrift probably finding it inconvenient to pay a call which was then imminent; the "King's shares" are still charged with the payment of this annuity, which is called the "King's clog." The "King's shares," pursuant to a stipulation made when the undertaking was formed, confer on their holders no voice in the management of the company. The property sold on Wednesday was offered in forty-seven lots, representing an income of £2,100 per annum, and the gross amount realised by the sale was £62,430. The first seventeen lots consisted of seventeen £100 new shares, fully paid up, the dividend for the last year being at the rate of 7½ per cent: these fetched on an average £196 each share. Lots 18 to 24 consisted of sixty-eight £100 shares, £20 per share paid up, with a dividend of 29s.: these realised £3,490, or an average of £51 6s. per share. Lots 25 to 38 consisted of parts of King's shares, equal together to four-fifths of an entire share. These were in lots of one-twentieth and one-sixteenth respectively, the income on a twentieth being £75 16s. 8d., and on a sixteenth £97 16s. 10d.: they realised altogether £31,930, which would be at the rate of £39,912 per whole share, and averaging twenty-six years and four months' purchase on the income. Lots 39 to 47 comprised five-twelfths of an adventurer's share, in lots of one-twentieth and one-thirtieth each respectively, and realised £17,650, which would be at the rate of £42,360 per whole share, and averaging twenty-six years purchase on the income. In 1823 one share was sold by auction for £17,050. From this it appears that the thirty-six shares which were surrendered for a commuted payment of £500 a-year in Charles II. time were in 1823 worth £613,800, or an annual income at Four per cent. of £24,452. Wednesday's sale with its return of £40,000 per share proves that the present annual income of the King's shares would be £56,160, or 112 times more than he was content to accept. It is very rarely that even fractional portions of New River shares find their way into the market. The increase in the annual income has been gradual and steady, and hence the high price obtainable for them. Once, however, within the memory of persons now living, the income on the shares fell back to £8 per whole share. This was in consequence of the expensive litigation which the New River Company carried on with other companies, paying the costs out of the income. Afterwards they adopted the plan of raising money to meet this expense. It is an oddity attendant on New River shares, in common with one or two old undertakings of a kindred sort, that the shares are real property. This was expressly decided in 1723, in the case of Drybutter v. Bartholomew (2 P. W. 127). It is easy to understand how, when joint stock undertakings were rare, and their shares individually few in number, there seemed no reason why real property owned by what was regarded then as merely a large partnership, should lose its characteristic as regards transmission or descent. Now a-days canal or railway shares are always constituted personal property by statute.

LONDON, JUNE 4, 1870.

THE PROPOSALS OF THE Legal Education Association, which we print elsewhere, commit the Association only to the two primary objects of a legal university, and an examination test conducted by a public board for both branches of the profession. It is, we believe, intended that a bill should be, if possible, introduced this session, in order to pave the way for legislation next year. So far as the scheme provides for a regular system of bar education it will be in principle a return to what Mr. Gladstone does not object to call the wisdom of our ancestors. It is not in the present day expedient to revive the legal university in all its details of college life and college discipline, but it is now proposed to revive the collegiate education, embracing both branches of the legal profession, and requiring of those students who propose to enter the higher branch a higher educational test. On this scheme the interference with the Inns of Court would not go further than the restricting their call to students who had passed the bar examinations, or taken the bar degree, with, perhaps, some comparatively small money requirement. At present, at any rate, nothing is said respecting any direct connection with the universities, in the nature, we mean, of promoting the study of law at Oxford and Cambridge. We ourselves should be disposed to deprecate any such idea, principally because we are not in favour of setting a young man very early in the groove in which he is to run during his life, and also because we believe that students inevitably learn more law in one month in London, surrounded by the actual transaction of their subject, than in twelve at Oxford or Cambridge, where they can imbibe only theory. It is somewhat premature to anticipate the details of the scheme of which as yet scarcely more than the broadest generalities have been hinted at. When the details are being discussed it will be for consideration whether the passage of lawyers from one branch of the profession to another should be made more easy and speedy than at present. On this point much caution is necessary. It is true, as Mr. Justice Hannen said, that every man should be allowed to do whatever he is best fitted for; but the avocations of counsel and solicitors or attorneys are so different that some qualification must be necessary before anyone can step from either branch to the other. We congratulate our readers upon this important subject being at last taken up in a discriminating and intelligent manner, by an association backed by names which command the highest confidence. With more space at our command another week we shall make further remarks. It is to be understood that the names which appear as those of gentlemen forming the "Council" of the Association, are not the result of any official selection, but merely the names of gentlemen who have voluntarily given in their approval of the scheme. They embrace authorities of all values, from the very highest down to none whatever.

ANYONE OF COURSE CAN UNDERSTAND the reluctance of the Government to appoint a new Lord Justice in the face of the impending High Court of Justice Bill, which, if it becomes law, will not require a second Lord Justice. This was stated fairly enough by Sir R. Collier on Monday, in reply to Mr. Winterbotham's question, with the intimation that "in the event of such an appointment becoming necessary," a short bill would be introduced to provide for a temporary appointment. But we are utterly astonished to find the Attorney-General declaring that he was not aware of any dissatisfaction in the profession at motions being heard on appeal by the Lord Justice sitting alone. Sir R. Collier has not, so far as we are aware, appeared in the Chancery Courts since the Lords Justices' Court became what Americans have called a "one-horse court;" and it would appear that he can have no acquaintances in any practice at the Chancery bar, otherwise he might have heard very much dissatisfaction expressed on account, not so much of arrears, as of the very uncomfortable result of having one judge overruling one judge. Lord Justice Giffard and Vice-Chancellor James are both exceedingly sound and able lawyers, and the respect felt by the profession for their judgments is as nearly equal as can be. It cannot fail, therefore, to be extremely uncomfortable, to put the inconvenience mildly, to have one of them sitting alone in judgment upon the other.

But however that may be, the second proposition of Sir R. Collier is sufficient to throw all mirror criticism into the shade. "It does not require," says the hon. gentleman, "any prerogative of the Crown to enable it to refrain from exercising a prerogative." In terms that is true; but when taken in connection with Mr. Winterbotham's question and the facts of the case, which show that the appointment spoken of was not a part of the inherent prerogative of the Crown (as the appointment of the common law judges is), but a power expressly conferred on the Crown by statute, and in respect of which it is provided, as if to take away possible inducement to tamper with its exercise, that the salary shall not be suspended during a vacancy, it follows, as it seems to us, that this is a power in the nature of a public trust, which the Crown has no more right to refuse to exercise than it would have to abolish of its own mere motion the office of Secretary of State for India. For, of course, if the Crown can lawfully abstain for an indefinite period from filling up the vacancy, it can, by a continuance of such abstinence, practically abolish the office altogether.

THE FULL COURT for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes gave judgment, last Thursday, in Mordaunt v. Mordaunt. It will be remembered that the suit is by a husband for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of the respondent's adultery. After the commencement of the suit it was alleged that the respondent was insane, and this question was tried before a jury, who found that she was insane at the time of the service upon her of the citation, and that she remained insane ever since. Lord Penzance then made an order staying all further proceedings in the suit until the respondent should recover her mental capacity. The petitioner appealed against this order to the Full Court; and the majority of the Court, Lord Penzance and Keating, J., have affirmed the order (Kelly, C.B., dissenting), holding that the insanity of the respondent is a bar to a suit for dissolution of marriage.

Keating, J., rested his opinion upon the analogy of the case to a criminal proceeding and also upon the provision of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. He concludes his judgment by saying, "meanwhile he [the petitioner] is in the same position as he would have been in before the passing of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. The facts of this case are not before us, but should it upon those facts, in consequence of any peculiar hardship, be deemed one fit for legislation, of course there is nothing to prevent it." Lord Penzance based his judgment on the provisions and machinery of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, and thought that the petitioner did not come within the statute. Kelly, C.B., thought that there was nothing to exclude the petitioner from the benefit of the statute, and that "the Court should stay the proceedings from time to time as long as a reasonable hope remains that the respondent may recover, but that when that hope shall have ceased the petitioner should be permitted to proceed with his suit."

The result of the decision now arrived at is very unsatisfactory. Not only is there the authority of the opinion of Kelly, C.B., against this decision, but the arguments in favour of that view seem certainly stronger than those relied on by Lord Penzance and Keating, J. We have before pointed out (ante 350) that there is no real analogy whatever between a suit for dissolution of marriage and a criminal proceeding, and also that it has been decided that a lunatic may prosecute a suit for nullity of marriage (Hancock v. Peaty, 1 P. M. & D.), or for a divorce (Parnell v. Parnell, 2 Hagg. 169); the present decision, therefore, creates an anomaly, which indeed Keating, J., seems to think may be a proper case for a private Act of Parliament.

The case may yet come before the House of Lords and be again argued, and Lord Penzance expressed himself ready to give any assistance in his power for the purpose of facilitating the appeal.

THE GOVERNMENT ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES BILL which was read the second time in the Upper House yesterday week proposes to repeal Sir Robert Peel's Ecclesiastical Titles Act of 1851. The bill did not meet with a very favourable reception, and will probably, if it is to become law, experience still more discussion when it gets into committee. Long before the Reformation banished the Pope from England both temporally and spiritually, our Legislature found it expedient to restrain the interference of the incumbent of the See of Rome with matters in England. Certain statutes, for instance, were passed concerning the importation of bulls from Rome, enactments which the "regular clergy" or monks seem to have systematically disobeyed. They remained, however, in the statute book, a demonstration that the English in their nationality did not choose that the Pope should meddle in certain matters, and as such they probably served their purpose. When, in the reign of George IV., the modern principle of religious toleration was brought up to the length of "Roman Catholic Emancipation," the 24th section of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act (1829), provided that since the Protestant Episcopal Church was established and the positions of its dignitaries settled by law, no other person should assume any title of archbishop of any province, bishop of any bishopric, or dean of any deanery, under pain of £100 penalty for each offence.

This section was considered as prohibiting only the assumption of titles already locally used by our own church dignitaries, although without doing any violence to its language, it might have been held to include titles not locally appropriated by the Church of England. When, therefore, in 1850, the Pope created what he chose to call episcopal sees in England, he considered himself, and was considered, as keeping beyond the pale of the Act of 1829, by assigning his bishops towns, such as Westminster, not locally associated with the name of any real English bishop. Sir Robert Peel's Act of 1851 was the outcome of all this, and that Act, after purporting to declare the law, forbade the assumption of any ecclesiastical title whatever, under a penalty of £100 at the suit of the Attorney-General. As a matter of toleration, it is sufficiently well known that these penalties are never sued for. Dr. Manning styles himself publicly Archbishop of Westminster, and Cardinal Cullen wears his red hat in Ireland, without the slightest apprehension that Sir R. P. Collier will institute proceedings against the one, or Mr. Barry against the other.

The principle on which the Government bill proceeds may be shortly stated to be this:—That Sir Robert Peel's Act has answered its purpose as a demonstration of the national Protestantism, and as a mere irritant had better be removed; also, as matter of detail, that since the Irish Church Abolition Act the surviving bishops of the late

Church of Ireland would be obnoxious to the Act of 1851; and that, as matter of principle concerning Ireland, the Act of 1851 is, so far as the Emerald Isle is concerned, "the last shred of disability" left untouched by the Irish Church Abolition Act. The bill proposes therefore to declare anew that foreign prelates are repugnant to law, and then abolish the £100 penalty by repealing the Act of 1851. The preamble recites that—

"It is not competent for any foreign prince, prelate, or potentate, or any other person whomsoever other than the Sovereign of this realm, to confer any title, rank, or precedence, or any authority or jurisdiction whatsoever, over the subjects of the realm, and all assumption of such authority or jurisdiction is wholly void."

And a subsequent proviso enacts that the repeal

"Shall not, nor shall anything in this Act contained, be deemed in any way to authorise or sanction the conferring or attempting to confer any rank, title, or precedence, authority, or jurisdiction, on or over any subject of this realm by any foreign prince, prelate, or potentate, or person whomsoever other than the Sovereign of this realm."

One characteristic of the bill is that it is intended to revive what, as we just now remarked, has been the practical effect of the Act of 1829—viz., a distinction between titles used by Church of England dignitaries (such, for instance, as "Dean of Westminster") and titles not so imposed (such, for instance, as "Archbishop of Westminster"). It would be confusing and indecorous, it is said, if such existing titles should be assumed. It seems to us that such a distinction is scarcely a judicious one. The English nation, very happily for itself, possesses a national faith which is not that of Rome, and it is a fundamental article of our law that the Pope has no jot of power, temporal or spiritual, within our territory. Our policy towards the Roman Catholic faith and its professors should be—perfect toleration, but not an atom of favour. As a spiritual political power the Papal Hierarchy has no existence in this realm; we ignore it completely. On that principle the Act of 1848, while authorising her Majesty to maintain diplomatic relations with "The Sovereign of the Roman States," forbade the reception as an ambassador of any person in Romish orders; though as a matter of principle, it would perhaps have been more consistent to have ignored the Roman Catholic orders. It would, we think, be better to complete our toleration of Ecclesiastical Titles foreign to our Church, by ignoring them in toto. As the proprietor of a certain educational establishment in Yorkshire remarked, when excusing himself for styling his place a "Hall," a man is free to call his house what he likes, and if he chooses to call it an island, no one has any right to object. So as to titles; if a respectable rate-payer chose to put a brass plate on his front door with "Bishop of Oxford" on it we do not think the law need meddle with him. As long as a Roman Catholic minister remains what he is, a Dissenting minister, it surely matters nothing whether he calls himself Bishop of Whitechapel or Bishop of London. On this principle it appears to us that it was as utterly improper to award to Cardinal Cullen at Dublin precedence as an archbishop, as it would be in another sense improper to deny him the courtesy due to a gentleman.

An objection was taken to the bill by Lord Cairns, that it still left the Irish Church bishops in statu quo by not repealing section 24 of the Act of 1829. But as those bishops are now bishops only by courtesy, without bishoprics, they are not obnoxious to what has, at any rate, been the accepted interpretation of that Act.

IT IS SOMEWHAT CURIOUS that an argument in the Common Pleas on a point of law reserved by the judge will result from the single election petition tried this year in England, though this did not happen once out of the numerous petitions heard before the judges last year. In the Bristol petition, tried before Baron Bramwell, various charges were made, but the only one substantiated was the charge of bribery by agents of the sitting member at the test ballot which had taken place. It was, of course, suggested that the money given for votes at the test ballot, was really intended also to influence the votes of the receivers at the election which ensued, but the judge held that this was not made out, and thus direct bribery was not established. It was, however, contended, on behalf of the petitioners, that the payments for votes at the test ballot, even if not meant to influence the particular voter at the election, amounted to bribery within the third sub-section of section 2 of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1854. This sub-section declares it to be bribery for any person to make any gift, directly or indirectly, to any other person in order to induce such other person to endeavour to procure the return of any person to Parliament. Now, there can be no doubt that the success of Mr. Robinson in the test ballot was an important step towards procuring his return. If he had been beaten then, he had agreed not to stand at the election; if successful then, he came forward with the prestige of being the candidate supported by a large number of the electors, and as the chosen representative of his party. Each vote given for him at the test ballot materially strengthened his position for the ultimate contest. It is, therefore, at least plausible to say that each person who voted for Mr. Robinson at the test ballot did endeavour to procure his return to Parliament. If that is so, it would be bribery to give money to anyone so to vote. At the same time it is impossible to suppose that the case was really contemplated by the Legislature when the Act was passed. The sub-section in question was aimed at the practice of buying a borough as it were by the purchase of the interest and support of influential individuals, which in former times at all events has been common enough in small boroughs. Still the section is general and would seem to cover payments for endeavouring in any manner to procure a return. We do not presume to predict what the decision of the Court of Common Pleas will be, but we think there can be no doubt that the point is one proper to be reserved for the full Court. It is quite a different one from that raised in several cases last year—viz., whether bribery at the municipal elections would affect the seat. This depended upon the question of fact, whether the payment was meant to influence the votes in both contests, which question Baron Bramwell has in the present case decided adversely to the petitioners.

The facts are to be stated in a special case and the Court has appointed Thursday next, the 9th of June, for the argument.

THE GRIEVANCE OF FALSE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES was before the House of Commons for the hundredth time last week. Adulteration has proved a difficult topic to deal with, but we do not think the same can be said of the sister grievance. An effective inspection may be established by providing that it shall never be a part of the officer's duty to send round to the shopkeepers to bring up their measures to be inspected, or to send word when he may be expected. We believe, however, that, in the metropolis at any rate, the deficiency is not in the detection, but in the punishment. This should be remedied by an importation of the French practice. After each conviction let a placard notifying the offence be fixed on the offender's shop; and it may be left in the justices' discretion to say how long it shall remain there.

THE BALLOT SCHEME.

NO. I.

The Ballot Bill has now been printed and circulated, but the second reading has been deferred until after the Whitsuntide holidays, without any day being appointed for taking it. It does not therefore seem very likely that it will pass this session, for it can scarcely be sent to the Lords until so late in the season that the majority there will have a fair pretext for throwing it out, if, as will probably be the case, they should wish to do so. Still, even if the bill does not pass into law, there will be considerable discussion upon the details before it is disposed of.

The bill appears to us carefully drawn on the whole, especially as regards the elaborate provisions made to secure practical secrecy as to individual votes. Indeed, assuming the object of the bill to be to combine practical secrecy with the possibility of a complete scrutiny, its faults appear to us principally owing to the precautions for secrecy being unnecessarily made so strict as to prevent the doings of returning officers and their subordinates from being sufficiently under the control of publicity to ensure confidence. We understand, however, that there will be a formidable opposition to the bill on the part of those who prefer a scheme giving absolute and inviolable secrecy, with the possibility only of a partial or incomplete scrutiny.

The bill is divided into two parts, the first of which contains the new provisions for nominations and for taking the poll, and the second contains only two clauses amending the Corrupt Practices Acts and one as to construction. These latter clauses, though certainly important, may be more shortly disposed of than the clauses in Part I.

In the first place payments by or on behalf of a candidate, which ought to be but are not included in the return of election expenses made to the returning officer, are to be deemed to be corrupt provided that they could not lawfully be made by the candidate himself. This latter proviso is a somewhat curious one, because so far as we are aware according to the law at present no payment can lawfully be made on behalf of a candidate which cannot be made lawfully by himself, though the contrary appears to be assumed by the proviso in question. A candidate may be liable to heavier penalties than another person, and different inferences may be drawn from his acts than would be drawn from those of others; still, if lawful on the part of others they would be on his also. As far as it goes the section is an improvement in the law, but it will not be found in practice to have nearly so extensive an operation as its framers probably suppose. If they had gone on to say not only that such payments should be deemed corrupt, but also that they should be deemed to have been made "in order to influence the election of such candidate," the result would have been much more effectual, as the seat of the candidate would be forfeited where such payments were shown to have been made by agents, without any further inquiry being necessary. Take, for instance, the case of refreshments given on the polling day in contravention of the 23rd section of the Corrupt Practices Act. Such payments, even when made by agents of candidates, were held by the late election judges not to affect the seats, unless they could from the evidence draw the inference that the payments were corrupt and made "in order to be elected," or "in order to influence votes," which propositions have to be established in order to make out treating under the 4th section. Usually if the judge thought the payment was made to influence the election he held it to be corrupt. This, therefore, was the point to which he turned his attention mainly. After the alteration now proposed in the law is made, if the payment is not entered in the accounts the judge will have to deem it corrupt, but in order to decide the further point necessary to make the seat forfeited he will have to consider exactly the same question as he formerly had to decide in order to see whether the payment was corrupt or not—viz., whether the payment was made in order to procure or influence the election.

The other amendment of the Corrupt Practices Acts which is proposed is that no committees shall meet at public-houses, and no rooms at public-houses be hired for any purpose connected with an election, except for a public meeting at which the candidate is present. This will do a great deal to put down the treating which has been so general. It is to be hoped, however, that too strict an interpretation will not be put upon the clause; as otherwise it might be held that a person who visited the town either as candidate, agent, or the like, solely for the purpose of the election, and slept at an hotel, had hired a room at a public-house (the definition of which includes hotel) for a "purpose connected with the election."

We return now to the consideration of Part I., the substantial part of the bill, and this again we find relates to two distinct subjects, one the method of taking nominations, the other the method of taking the poll. The plan for nominations is a decided improvement upon the present system. The returning officer is to appoint a period of two hours at some room to be named for taking the nomination or election. During the two hours written nominations may be presented, and may also be amended if defective in point of form, or may be withdrawn. At the end of the two hours, if the number of candidates nominated and remaining in the field does not exceed the number of seats, they are to be declared elected. If the number does exceed the number of seats then a poll is to take place as a matter of course, and the election is to be deemed a contested one. Nevertheless a candidate may still retire if he pleases before the poll is taken, and if by such retirement the number of candidates is reduced to the number of seats then no poll is to take place, but the liability to such expenses as have been incurred by the returning officer is to remain notwithstanding the retirement of the candidate. The nomination papers are each to be signed by ten electors—a proposer and seconder and eight other electors—as assenting to the nomination. These ten electors are to be jointly and severally liable to their candidate's share of the expenses of the returning officer if the election is contested, but the candidate is to be at liberty to pay in their place, or repay to them anything they have paid. Under the present law candidates nominated with their consent are liable to their share of the expenses, and if a candidate is nominated without his consent his proposer and seconder are liable. In practice under the proposed law the candidate will always pay unless he has been nominated without his consent, and therefore no great alteration will be made. It would, however, be a convenience to provide that the candidate might undertake the original liability, leaving his nominators only liable as sureties for him, if at all. If a form were given to be signed by the candidate taking the liability on himself, and to be presented with the nomination paper, it would, we think, save much trouble to returning officers, without altering the result.

The provisions as to the ballot next claim our attention. We shortly noticed the nature of these clauses a few weeks since, and our readers are no doubt acquainted with the general character of the scheme. The details are, however important, and though, as we have said, carefully drawn, the bill does not give the various steps to be taken quite in the order in which they must occur. It may, therefore, assist even those who have read the bill, that we should give the steps in order. On the occasion of every contested election, the returning officer is to provide a sufficient number of ballot papers, with counterfoils. There is to be a number or mark on the counterfoil and a corresponding number or mark on the back of the ballot paper. On the face of the ballot papers are to be the names of the candidates with the figure of a square opposite to each. There are to be also certain printed directions on the ballot papers. The returning officer is to appoint in each polling place as many polling stations as he thinks convenient, and to provide a ballot box and one or more secret compartments within which voters may mark their ballot papers unobserved for each polling station. The returning officer is then to appoint a deputy returning officer, to act as presiding officer at each polling station. These presiding officers are the most important of all the officials engaged. There is no special qualification required for the office nor any remuneration named in the bill, but as they are to be deputy returning officers and the Act is to be construed together with the other Acts, they will be entitled to the same remuneration as deputies are now, which is two guineas a day in England. The presiding officer is not to take any oath, but he, together with other persons named, is to make a statutory declaration called a declaration of secrecy and fidelity to office. In the form given, however, there is nothing about fidelity to office in any other respect than in the single matter of secrecy. At present the law is different in England, Ireland and Scotland in respect of the qualification, oath and remuneration of deputy returning officers, and it is perhaps unnecessary to give the details, though we mention the provisions of this bill because we think the success of the scheme, so far as its obtaining public confidence is concerned, depends to a great extent upon these presiding officers being above suspicion. The returning officer is to give to each presiding officer a certain number of ballot papers, for which he is to give a receipt. On the polling day the only persons who may remain in the polling station are the presiding officer and his clerk, and one agent for each candidate, if the candidate likes to appoint one, or the candidate himself. It is left somewhat doubtful whether the candidates may visit the polling stations unless they take upon themselves the duties which an agent might perform, and if they do this they cannot afterwards attend when the returning officer adds up the votes. Before commencing the poll the presiding officer is to exhibit the ballot box empty to the agents of the candidates, if present, and is then to lock up the box. The voters will then be admitted, and they are not to be allowed to remain in the polling station a longer time than is necessary for voting. We presume some regulation will be made to prevent more than a certain number of voters entering together. The voter is then to state to the presiding officer his name or number on the register, as at present, but instead of having his vote recorded as now he is to receive a ballot paper. At this point a doubt occurs whether the agents of the candidates who are to be present are to have the powers and perform the duties of agents appointed to detect personation under the present law,—whether the questions are to be put and oath taken by the voter if required, and so on. Nothing is expressly stated in the Act as to this, but it is doubtless intended to be provided for by the general section incorporating all laws, &c., relating to polling, not inconsistent with the new Act. The only part directly inconsistent is the direction that an entry shall be made in the poll book against the vote in such cases “protested against for personation.” This of course cannot be done, and no substitute for it is provided. The presiding officer, when he gives the voter his ballot paper, is to enter on the counterfoil the register number of the voter, and against the name in the register he is to put a mark showing that some person had voted in that name. The voter, on receiving his voting paper, is to retire to the secret compartment, and put a cross in the square opposite the names of the candidates for whom he votes. He is then to fold up the paper so as to show the mark on the back, and proceed at once to the ballot box, and, having exhibited the mark to the presiding officer, is to put his paper in the ballot box. If he or any other person makes any mark on his voting paper by which it may be identified, or if he wilfully displays his ballot paper so as to show how he has voted he is to be liable to two years’ imprisonment. If, however, he spoils his ballot paper or deals with it in any way so that it will not give his vote as he wishes it, and proves this to the satisfaction of the presiding officer, and gives up the spoiled paper, the officer may give him another. The spoiled papers are to be kept separately by the presiding officer. If after one person has voted for a particular name on the register another person claims to do so, the presiding officer is to put the questions and administer the oath authorised by law and may then give him a voting paper, but this paper, when filled up, is not to be put in the ballot box and counted as a vote, but is to go into a separate packet of duplicate papers, which will consist, therefore, of tendered duplicate votes. No provision is made by the bill for other persons not on the register tendering their votes. At present any person whose name is struck off the register by the revising barrister may tender his vote, and in case of a scrutiny the revising barrister’s decision will be reviewed. To complete the scheme of the bill a provision must be inserted providing for such tenders, the ballot papers being, of course, kept either in a separate packet or with the duplicate papers. One other case that may arise during the polling is provided for by the bill, which is the case of persons blind or unable to read or otherwise incapacitated from voting as other persons according to the Act. In these cases the presiding officer may secretly mark the voting paper as requested by the voter and put it into the box. At the close of the poll the presiding officer is first to seal up the counterfoils in the presence of the agents who may also seal the packet. He is then to open the ballot box, and taking out the papers, is to place them with their backs upwards, not looking at the faces or allowing any one else to do so, and is to seal them up. He is also to seal up the spoiled ballot papers, the duplicate ballot papers, and the unused ballot papers, and to make out an account showing the numbers in each of the four packets, which, added together, should, of course, give the total number of ballot papers for which he has previously given a receipt. The counterfoils are to be sent immediately to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery; all the other packets are to go in to the returning officer. The latter, who is not to be permitted to act as presiding officer at any polling station, is, in the presence of agents of the candidates, who, however, are not to be the same agents as have attended at any polling station, to open the packets of used ballot papers and count the votes. He is to be bound to place them face upwards, so that neither he nor the agents can see the backs (on which, however, are only marks which without the counterfoils give no information), and he is to decide all questions arising as to the candidate for whom votes are intended to be given, and to reject all voting papers which are void, either from anything being written on them or from the voter having voted for too many candidates. His decision on these points is to be open to review on a scrutiny. Having thus ascertained the state of the poll he is to declare it. Besides this he may open the packets of spoiled duplicates and unused papers for the purpose of verifying the accounts returned to him by the presiding officers, but only for that purpose, and he is to seal them up again. He is not, of course, to reckon the duplicate papers in the poll, but it seems he is not even to look at them to see the number of votes given by them for the various candidates. Afterwards all the documents are to be sent sealed up to the clerk of the Crown, and are not to be opened by any one except under the order of a competent court, which is defined to be the House of Commons or any tribunal having cognisance of election petitions. As to the counterfoils the Court is not to order them to be opened until some vote has been shown to have been given by a disqualified person, and then only for the purpose of ascertaining for whom the vote was given. After the election the copies of the register showing which voters have received ballot papers, are to be open to inspection, and may be copied. All the documents sent to the clerk of the Crown are to be kept for two years, and then secretly destroyed unless the House orders the contrary.

We have now detailed, nearly in the language of the bill, but more nearly in their true order, the various steps to be taken. We propose next week to criticise these provisions, and at the same time to offer some remarks upon an alternative scheme.

Dr. Thomas R. Pearson, of Stowmarket, has been appointed (by Mr. F. B. Marriott, coroner) to be deputy coroner for Suffolk, and the appointment has been duly approved by the Lord Chancellor.

THE SEPARATE ESTATE OF A WIFE.

No. II.

When we broke off at the end of our previous article, we had just begun to consider the liability of the separate estate in respect of the woman's "general engagements." It was once thought that something more even than mere writing was necessary to bind the separate estate, but any notion of that kind has now long since vanished. Lord Justice Turner summed up the authorities, as we have said, in Johnson v. Gallagher (9 W. R. 506, 3 D. F. & J. 515), and stated finally his conclusion that the separate property is liable to the general engagements. Johnson v. Gallagher has ever since been treated as settling that question; we need not, therefore, go behind it for the sake of the mere history of the topic.

In Johnson v. Gallagher Lord Justice Turner, like other judges who have touched the subject, was careful to guard himself from saying that the separate estate is necessarily bound by every general engagement. We must therefore examine the limitations of the liability. Before doing so it will be proper for us to observe that there is a good deal of confusion (due sometimes, we fancy, to the reporters, and sometimes to the judges) in the judicial statements about the married woman's inability to contract. It is said, for instance, that neither in law nor in equity can a married woman bind herself by contract. Now this is true only if taken literally. There is not the slightest difficulty about the matter. The fact is that neither in law nor in equity can the wife bind herself by any contract; she cannot by any contract give a personal equity against herself; but she may by contract bind or charge her separate property, so that the Court of Equity will assist the person with whom she dealt by laying its hand, in rem, upon that; and quoad her separate estate she can deal as though she were a feme sole. We will now return to the "general engagements" subject. Lord Justice Turner, in Johnson v. Gallagher, after establishing the general proposition of the liability of the separate estate, proceeded as follows:—

"I am not prepared, however, to go to the length of saying that the separate estate will in all cases be affected by a mere general engagement. The cases of Jones v. Harris and Aguilar v. Aguilar show that the engagement which, if the married woman was a feme sole, the law would create for the repayment of a void annuity would not affect it. It seems to follow that to affect the separate estate there must be something more than the mere obligation which the law would create in the case of a single woman. What that something more may be must, I think, depend in each case upon the circumstances. What might affect the separate estate in the case of a married woman living separate from her husband, might not, as I apprehend it, affect it in the case of a married woman living with her husband. What might bind the separate estate if the credit be given to the married woman, would not, as I conceive, bind it if the credit be not so given. The very term "general engagement," when applied to a married woman, seems to import something more than mere contract, for neither in law nor in equity can a married woman be bound by contract merely: Aylett v. Ashton."

Aylett v. Ashton (1 My. & Cr. 111) merely decides that there is no personal remedy against the woman; it was the case of a specific performance bill filed against her, and the Court observed that, though she could make her separate property answerable for her engagements, she could confer no right to a personal remedy against herself; for this reason the bill, which was framed as asking only a personal decree against the married woman, was dismissed. In Jones v. Harris (9 Ves. 493), the first of the cases cited by Sir G. Turner in the above extract, a married woman having separate estate had for valuable consideration granted an annuity; the annuity afterwards became void through the laches of the grantee in not duly registering a memorial as required by certain Acts. It was held that the grantee could not come into court as a plaintiff and claim as against her separate estate a resulting trust in his own favour for the amount of the purchase-money which he had paid. But this case and that of Duke of Bolton v. Williams (2 Ves. Jr. 155), which is to the same effect, are worth very little, because they seem to have gone on the fact of the plaintiff's own omission having caused the failure of the annuity. Aguilar v. Aguilar (5 Madd. 414) was another case of a void annuity; in the report of that case it is not stated that the annuity fell through in consequence of any omission on the grantee's part, but we do not see how it can have failed in any other way. Here the woman was the plaintiff; she had joined her husband in granting the annuity, charging her separate estate with it, and now came into court with a bill praying to have the separate estate exonerated. Vice-Chancellor Leach decided that she was entitled to ask that relief without by her bill offering, as any other plaintiff must have done, to repay the purchase-money. The Vice-Chancellor based this departure from the general maxim, "Who seeks equity must do equity," upon the fact that she could not be sued at law for the price, as any other person could have been, and hence, he said, there was no lien for the price upon her separate estate; he proceeded also to say (or the reporter makes him say) "that a feme covert could not, by the equitable possession of separate property, acquire a power of contract; she had a power of disposition as incident to property and her actual disposition or appointment of the property would bind her." That is a most unfortunate sentence: nothing could bind her, but it is distinctly true, as we have said, that as concerns her separate property the woman can contract as if she were a feme sole. We do not think that Jones v. Harris and Aguilar v. Aguilar do establish, as Turner, L.J., said, "that the engagement which, if the married woman was a feme sole, the law would create for the repayment of the consideration of a void annuity, would not affect it." We cannot, of course, say what might be ruled if, in the face of the above sentence, a similar point were to be raised anew, but we are inclined to think that if the question in Aguilar v. Aguilar were now being considered for the first time, it would be held that the wife, being perfectly able to charge her separate estate with an annuity, and having, in fact, granted an annuity for valuable consideration, she must, quoad the separate estate, be treated as any other suitor not under disability would have been treated with regard to his or her own property—that the Court, in short, would require her to offer repayment of the purchase-money.

It seems to us, in short, that Lord Justice Turner has deduced his inference as to the intention to be shown in each case, upon grounds which, when examined, hardly support it. There are, however, other cases in which this doctrine of intention is assumed. Thus Lord Langdale, in Tullett v. Armstrong (4 Beav. 319), says:—

"It is perfectly clear that where a woman has property settled to her separate use she may bind that property without distinctly stating that she intends to do so. She may enter into a bond, bill, promissory note, or other obligation, which, considering her state as a married woman, could only be satisfied by means of her separate estate; and therefore the inference is conclusive that there was an intention, and a clear one, on her part that her separate estate, which would be the only means of satisfying the obligation into which she entered, should be bound. . . . But in a case where she enters into no bond, contract, covenant, or obligation, and in no way contracts to do any act on her part; where the instrument which she executes does not purport to bind or to pass anything whatever that belongs to her; and where it must consequently be left to mere inference whether she intended to affect her estate in any manner or way whatever, the case is entirely different either from the case where she executes a bond, promissory note, or other instrument, or where she enters into a covenant or obligation by which she, being a married woman, can be considered as binding her separate estate."

Let us turn from these a priori investigations and see what was actually done in Johnson v. Gallagher. There a woman, living apart from her husband and having separate estate, carried on a trade, and in the way of her trade bought goods on credit. Turner, L.J., said:—"I think that where, under such circumstances, a married woman contracts debts the Court is bound to impute to her the intention to deal with her separate estate, unless the contrary is clearly proved. The Court cannot impute to her the dishonesty of not intending to pay for the goods which she purchased. The circumstances preclude the inference that she expected her husband to pay."

How then could she intend that the payment should be made otherwise than out of her separate estate? Again, in Picard v. Hine (18 W. R. 178, L. R. 5 Ch. 277) a wife living apart from her husband contracted with the plaintiff to buy of him the lease of a shop. A specific performance bill having been filed, to which she and the trustee were made parties, praying a decree against her separate estate; Lord Hatherley, L.C., said:—"When she by entering into an agreement, allows the supposition to be made that she intends to perform the agreement out of her property, she creates a debt which may be recovered, not by reaching her, but by reaching her property."

The rule may be taken to be this:—Where a married woman enters into a contract which at the time she has no means of fulfilling except at the expense of her separate estate, the Court will assume her to have intended the honest consequences of her action, and will hold her separate estate liable. We do not, for instance, imagine that to a bill filed by a creditor seeking to avail himself of the separate estate, a woman would be heard to say that she never intended to pay at all, and so did not intend to charge his separate estate. Of course, as regards mere debts, the fact that the woman was living with her husband when they were contracted would afford an almost irrebuttable presumption that she did not mean to charge her separate estate. Whenever, as, for instance, was the case in Hulme v. Tenant (1 Wh. & Tu. L. C.), a wife having separate estate joins her husband in an obligation, there arises at once a presumption that it was with the view of binding her separate estate, since, unless that were the object, her joining would be a mere farce.

But before a creditor can enforce any remedy against the separate estate, he must obtain a decree, unless he can show a contract specifically charging a particular fund (Davies v. McHenry, L. R. 6 Eq. 462).

We may mention, with reference to solicitor's costs incurred by married women, the cases of Murray v. Barlee (3 My. & K. 208), Callow v. Horle (1 De G. & Sm. 534), and Re Pugh (17 Beav. 336). The first was a simple case of a "general engagement: the wife, living separate, incurred costs, and wrote promising to pay, but making no reference to her separate estate: it was held liable. In the second it was held that the mere transaction of business relating to separate estate vested in trustees, the solicitor having been employed as the solicitor of both husband and wife who lived together, was not enough to charge the separate estate with the costs. In the third a wife whose husband was imbecile employed a solicitor in certain matters relating, not to her separate estate, but to the rights of her children in a suit to which she was a stranger: her separate estate was held not liable.

We shall conclude our sketch of this subject next week.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

WIFE'S EQUITY—FORM OF SETTLEMENT.

Croston v. May, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 475.

With respect to cases of this kind the Court will exercise its discretion, not only as to the relative apportionment of the fund between the wife and children on the one hand, and the husband on the other, but also as to the form of the settlement, particularly with respect to the limitation of the fund settled. With respect to the first branch of the subject, the proportion to be settled, suffice it to say that the old rule, which was to settle one half, has long been departed from (Beresford v. Hobson, 1 Madd. 362), and the Court is now governed by the circumstances of each case. In Spiro v. Willows (14 W. R. 941), three-fourths of the fund was settled; in Carter v. Taggart (5 De G. & Sm. 49), two-thirds; and the whole has been settled in cases of desertion and personal violence (Gilchrist v. Cator, 1 De G. & Sm. 466). The cases on this branch of the subject are collected in Re Suggitt's Trusts (16 W. R. 551), where Lord Justice Selwyn decided that the Court would not settle the whole of a wife's fund upon her and her children unless the husband was insolvent, or had been guilty of gross misconduct.

With respect to the ultimate limitation of the fund, the rule extracted by Lord Chelmsford is, that the ultimate limitation, in default of children, shall be to the husband, whether he survive his wife or not (Spiro v. Willows, 14 W. R. 941). In this case, as in Croston v. May, the Court declined to give the wife the fund if she survived the husband. The principle on which the Court acts is, to let in the equity of the wife and children, and to that extent to exclude the husband's marital right. But as soon as that equity is satisfied (as in the event of the wife dying without issue), the marital right ought to revive; of course, in the absence of special circumstances, such as those pointed out in Spiro v. Willows—viz., where there has been misconduct on his part, or he is unable to maintain his wife, or the fund is extremely small. In general the ultimate limitation in default of children will be to the husband. The wife's equity extends to her children and to her own life if she have no child, but not beyond.

Where the marriage has taken place under circumstances which amount to a contempt, as by the marriage of a female ward without consent, a different principle applies. In such cases the ward's interest is to be consulted in the settlement, and that alone, unless the other and subordinate purpose of protection against the husband can be accomplished without any prejudice to the ward (per Lord Brougham, C., in Birkett v. Hibbert, 3 My. & K. 230). In a case of Re Giles's Settled Estates, recently before Vice-Chancellor Stuart, there had been a petition for the sale of an estate, and before any order was made thereon, one of the petitioners, then aged nineteen, ran away with, and was married to, a man without means. On a subsequent petition for payment of the proceeds to the parties absolutely entitled, including the petitioner (then of age) and her husband, the Vice-Chancellor declined to take her consent in court, and ordered the fund to be carried to her separate account, with a direction that the same should be held in trust for her for life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, with the usual provision for her children by her then or any future husband, and in default of children, for her next of kin as if she had never been married, thus excluding the husband altogether. The ratio decidendi here was, that the presentation of a petition under the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act puts an infant petitioner in the position of a ward of court. Vice-Chancellor Kinderley has held that payment of a fund into court under the Legacy Duty Act (Re Hilary, 13 W. R. 959), or under the Lands Clauses Act (Re Wilts &c. Railway Company, 13 W. R. 959), does not make the infant owner of the fund a ward of court. Payment into court under the Trustee Relief Act, however, has been held to make an infant a ward of court, where an order had been made in the matter, allowing her maintenance out of the fund (Re Hodge's Settlement, 3 K. & J. 213). And the true principle appears to be that the custody of the infant's property in every case draws with it the custody of the infant, and makes him or her a ward of court.

COMMON LAW.

DISTRESS—RAILWAYS—FIXTURES.

Turner v. Cameron, Q.B., 18 W. R. 544.

This case decides that the iron rails and sleepers of a railway cannot be distrained for rent. The question was "whether the rails and sleepers forming the railways under consideration continued to be personal chattels, or whether by reason of their annexation to the freehold they became fixtures." It was found in the case that the railways in question were private railways made for the better enjoyment of some collieries, and were so far permanent that they were intended to remain on the premises as auxiliary to the working of the mines until, at least, the expiration of the term for which the mines were let.

The only difficulty in the case was one of fact rather than of law. There is seldom any dispute as to the definition of fixtures; but the question usually is, whether particular articles have or have not become fixtures. This decision has now settled the question as to lines of railway.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—DURATION OF TERM.

Cornish v. Stubbs, C.P., 18 W. R. 547.

It is a general rule that the duration of leases for years ought to be ascertained either by the express limitation of the parties at the time of making the lease or by a reference to some collateral act which may with equal certainty measure the continuance of the term, otherwise they will be void. (Woodfall L. & T. 9th ed. 104.)

This rule was discussed in Cornish v. Stubbs. There was an agreement for a tenancy of a house and premises from week to week, determinable, therefore, by a week's notice; and it was in addition agreed that the tenant should have a reasonable time to remove his goods after the determination of the tenancy. The tenancy was duly determined by notice, but the lessor did not allow the tenant (the plaintiff) a reasonable time to remove his goods from the premises. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action against the lessor, in which the material question was whether such an agreement as that between the plaintiff and defendant was good in law.

For the defendant it was argued that the duration of the time beyond the week for which notice had to be given, was too indefinite to create an extension of the term, and that it was, therefore, void.

There was no direct authority upon the point, but Willes, J., referred to Littleton, section 69, where it is said that if a house be let to one to hold at will, the lessee shall have a reasonable time to take away his goods after he is put out. It was held in accordance with this passage from Littleton that there was no objection in law to the agreement, and that it operated as an extension of the term, "not for all purposes, but for all acts necessary for the removal of the goods."

There were some other points in the case, but none calling for any notice here.

TAXATION OF COSTS—PRACTICE—FEES ALLOWED TO GOOD JURY UPON A WRIT OF INQUIRY.

Vickery v. London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, C.P., 18 W. R. 549.

The judgment in this case contains some curious antiquarian information concerning the payment of jurors. The inquiry goes back as far as the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when it was apparently the custom, according to Smith's Commonwealth, that "the party with whom the jury have given their sentence giveth the inquest their dinner that day commonly; and this is all they have for their labour notwithstanding that they come some twenty, some thirty, or forty miles or more to the place where they give their verdict. All the rest is at their own charge." The custom as to paying jurors is traced from that period down to the present day, and the conclusion arrived at by the Court is that "so far back as living memory extends, the fee to a special jurymen has been a guinea, and that fee appears to have been recognised by Acts of Parliament and sanctioned by the courts. It is true that it seems to depend upon usage, but many similar payments and most important rights and privileges have no other foundation than the usage and practice of the Courts, and, the payment in question being only a just and reasonable remuneration to the jury for their labour and services, we are of opinion that it may and ought to be sanctioned as it has hitherto been."

In accordance with this view it was held that a payment which had been allowed on taxation by the master of one guinea a-piece to each member of a "good jury," who had been taken from the special jury list and had assessed damages on a writ of inquiry was reasonable, and that the taxation ought not to be reviewed.

REVIEWS.

Elementary Precedents in Conveyancing: a Collection of Practical Forms Designed for Professional use and Suited to the Emergencies of Actual Practice. With Notes, and Table of Stamp Duties. By THOMAS WILKINSON, Esq. London: Horace Cox.

This little collection of Precedents originally, we believe, appeared in a serial form in the pages of the Law Times. The intention of its compiler seems to have been to furnish a collection serviceable to articulated clerks in the daily recurring demands of matters in which "time or expense (or both) prevents the employment of more formal and elaborate instruments." "It is sufficiently perplexing," says the author, "to peruse in Davidson or Pridaux strict settlements with their elaborate provisions for jointure, pin-money, portions, and the complicated machinery of remainders and cross-remainders, and to find in actual practice that your prosaic client wishes his settlement to comprise shares in a barge or a building society, a life policy, some furniture, and a renewable leasehold, without having altogether to rely upon one's unaided efforts to frame so heterogeneous a document; yet in everyday life perhaps the family estates are the exception, and the very mixed personality the rule!"

A good collection of this kind would be useful in a solicitor's office; and might be used appropriately by a conveying clerk thoroughly versed in his business, to save the time otherwise devoted to inventing formulae of his own.

The present collection includes many topics on which a practitioner called on to draw an agreement or other document with despatch may be glad of assistance—such, for instance, as an agreement to let a theatre, or to hire a steam-engine with option of purchase, besides a great many useful forms of notice and so forth. These latter will probably be found useful in solicitors' offices, especially in the country; but we fear young clerks could hardly be trusted with the precedents unless informed by better and fuller notes; and the notes in the present volume appear to us neither sufficient nor wholly reliable. At page 176, for instance, is given a form of receipt by a legatee for his share of residue, in which the legatee undertakes to execute a release: now if there were to be any notes at all it should have been noted here that, though a release is customary, the executor cannot require more than the simple receipt. Again, at page 225 is given a form for an "undertaking by a mortgagor on a second mortgagee discharging a building society's first mortgage." To this is appended a note in which it is stated that "the person entitled to the reconveyance is the person who is empowered to call upon the holder of the legal estate and to demand a re-conveyance from him of such estate," with a reference to Barry's Law of Building Societies, 114, and Prosser v. Rice (23 Beav. 68). Now, setting aside the absurdity of the sentence between the inverted commas, from which we should infer that its writer had no perception of the real bearing of section 5 of the Building Societies Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32), the note ought, instead of citing Prosser v. Rice, decided by the Master of the Rolls in 1859, to have cited Pease v. Jackson (17 W. R. 1, L. R. 3 Ch. 576), decided by Lord Cairns in 1868, the effect of which is to overrule Lord Romilly's decision in Prosser v. Rice. Again, we find no mention whatever, either in the table of stamp duties or elsewhere, of the building lease point decided in Boulton's case (18 W. R. 35). It is true that this latter subject may have received its development subsequently to the publication of the work in its serial form, but the preface professes that all the precedents and notes have been carefully revised, and the table of stamp duties appended, "since the completion of the work in its serial form."

The Indian Penal Code. By ANGELO J. LEWIS, M.A. London: W. H. Allen & Co.

This is the first of a series of "Indian Law Manuals" which Mr. Lewis is going to add to our stock of literature on Indian law. His plan, to judge from his treatment of the Penal Code, is to give a series of questions and to answer them in as near as possible the language of the Indian Legislature. This, Mr. Lewis admits in his preface is an "inelegant form," but he thinks it the best for imparting instruction to "the student who approaches the subject for the first time." We cannot agree with him in this dictum. His manual would convey but a poor idea of the Penal Code to a student who had never seen the original; although it would be very useful indeed to him, when he has studied the code itself, to test his knowledge by. To substitute it for the code would be to pander to what is the existing curse of the Indian Civil Service examinations, as far as law is concerned, viz.—cram. Mr. Lewis also thinks that the manual will be "not less appropriate to the young practitioner." Here, again, we are sorry to have to differ from him. To a few of the answers are appended brief notes, and these notes, although generally useful as far as they go, are in some cases wanting in that accuracy which is essential even in a legal work intended for a student, and the absence of which is fatal to a work intended for the practitioner. We may cite the notes to answers 20 and 240 as samples of what we mean. From the first the student would gather that rights, as distinguished from corporeal property, and choses in action, are in the English law synonymous terms. In the second case, extortion is described as the taking property with the consent of the owner, such consent being obtained by putting the owner in fear of hurt—whereas it should be in fear of injury. Hurt and injury are explained in the code itself—to cause hurt is to cause bodily pain, disease or infirmity (section 319); "injury denotes any harm whatever illegally caused to any person, in body, mind, or reputation, or property" (section 44). "Injury" is therefore a much wider term than "hurt," and Mr. Lewis's description of extortion is essentially incorrect.

The American Law Review. April, 1870. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. London: Stevens & Haynes.

The Law Magazine and Law Review. May, 1870. New Series. London: Butterworths.

The American Law Review for April does not contain anything of much interest to English readers. There is an article on "Contributory Negligence on the Part of an Infant," in which it is argued that the negligence of a parent or guardian in suffering a child to be exposed to injury ought not to bar the child's right to recover compensation for such injury from the person causing it.

"The right of a landlord to regain possession by force" is the subject of another article in which are discussed the well-known English cases Newton v. Harland (1 M. & G. 644), and Harvey v. Bridges (14 M. & W. 437), together with many other English and American decisions. There are also the usual digests of cases and book notices.

The subject most likely to attract attention amongst those treated in the Law Magazine for May is the review of the Civil Code of New York. This and the other codes (the Penal Code, Political Code, &c.) of New York have been already a good deal discussed in this country, and the article in this number of the Law Magazine does not add much to what has already been said on the subject. It has, however, the great merit of containing a clearly expressed opinion as to the merits, or rather demerits, of the code—viz., that it is "in a high degree meagre, ambiguous, and inaccurate. . . . To the practitioner it will, except so far as it effects alterations in the existing law, be absolutely useless." There is also an interesting article by the Hon. W. Beach Lawrence on "The marriage laws of various countries as affecting the property of married women." It contains a great deal of valuable information in a very condensed form.

The remaining articles on The Law Military, The Diary of a Barrister (a long and very much "padded" notice of Henry Crabb Robinson), Friendly Societies, Mr. Justice Hayes, On a MSS. of Vacarius, Church Patronage, Compulsory Pilotage, and the Judicature Bills, are of the usual character. There are besides notices of a number of new books.

COURTS.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

May 30.—Re Hieistad.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 84—Case in which it was impossible to form a quorum of creditors.

R. Griffiths applied for the direction of the Court under the following circumstances:—

An adjudication of bankruptcy had been obtained against a debtor who had four creditors only. At the first meeting but one creditor attended, and the registrar directed that the proceedings should stand adjourned. At the adjourned sitting the same difficulty arose, one creditor only being in attendance, and the registrar then reported the facts to the Chief Judge for his direction thereon. The question arose, what could be done? It was impossible to form a quorum of creditors, and the petitioning creditor had incurred considerable expense in obtaining the adjudication. By the 84th section it was provided that the Court might annul the adjudication unless it was deemed expedient to carry on the bankruptcy with the aid of the registrar as trustee.

Mr. Beard (solicitor), for the bankrupt.

The CHIEF JUDGE intimated that, in accordance with the terms of the section, it was incumbent on the petitioning creditor to make out some case for a continuance of the bankruptcy.

R. Griffiths said that the debtor being once in bankruptcy it was impossible for him to get out until he paid ten shillings in the pound, and it was important, therefore, in the interest of the petitioning creditor, whose claim amounted to £900, that the adjudication should not be annulled.

The CHIEF JUDGE intimated that the petitioning creditor should have come prepared with some evidence, but said that as the point was new he would adjourn the matter for a few days to give the petitioning creditor an opportunity of making out a case.

Solicitor for the petitioning creditor, Chidley.

June 1.—Re Burton.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 16, rule 166—Issue of subpoenas for examination of alleged creditors.

Mr. John Evans (solicitor), on behalf of the petitioning creditor under this adjudication, applied, pursuant to the 166th of the new rules, for subpoenas to examine the brother-in-law, the father-in-law, and other alleged creditors of the bankrupt at the first meeting appointed pursuant to section 16 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. The matter had been brought before the registrars, and they declined to issue the summonses, but referred the applicant to the court.

In support of the application it was stated that it would be to the interest of the general body of the creditors that subpoenas should issue for the examination of certain of the bankrupt's relatives who put forward proofs of debt and who intended to vote by proxy. The family claims were disputed by the petitioning creditor; and it was desirable that the proofs should be investigated, because, if admitted, the trade creditors would be outvoted, and the bankrupt's brother would be appointed trustee. The 166th rule gave the Court power to issue a subpoena for the attendance of a witness capable of giving evidence "concerning any matter in the Court," but the registrars were of opinion that the rule did not apply where the sole object of the petitioning creditor was to ascertain whether a debt was bonâ fide owing to the intended witness.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that doubtless in proper cases subpoenas might be issued, but the proper course in this case would be to allow the first meeting to take place, and, if the proofs were tendered and disputed, the registrar might, if necessary, adjourn, and he also might, if necessary, allow subpoenas to be issued for the attendance of witnesses. At present it was not requisite that subpoenas should issue.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. ROBERT DAWBARN, jun., solicitor, of March, Cambridgeshire, has been appointed Registrar to the March County Court, in the room of his deceased partner, Mr. F. J. Wise. He has likewise been appointed Clerk to the Justices of the March division, and also Clerk to the Local Committee under "The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869." Among other appointments to which Mr. Dawbarn has been elected since the death of Mr. Wise, may be mentioned that of Clerk to the Board of Middle Level Commissioners, at a salary of £350 a year, and treasurer of the Isle of Ely. He has also become secretary to the March Gas and Coke Company (Limited), and clerk to the Charity Trustees. The stewardship of the manor of Chatteris has also devolved upon him. Mr. Dawbarn was admitted in 1846, and is the son of Mr. Robert Dawbarn, of Wisbeach.

Mr. BENJAMIN TERRY, solicitor, of Bradford, and an alderman of that borough, has been appointed by the West Riding magistrates acting for the division of East Morley, to conduct all cases of felony and misdemeanour. The object of this appointment, it is stated, is to prevent the compromising of cases deserving of punishment, and so to secure the more effectual administration of justice. Mr. Alderman Terry was certificated in Easter Term, 1843, and is senior member of the local firm of Terry & Robinson.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS SOUTHGATE, solicitor, of Gravesend, has been appointed Clerk to the Improvement Commissioners of that borough, in succession to his father, the late Mr. Francis Southgate, who held the appointment for forty-one years. During thirty-six years of that period, Mr. F. T. Southgate had been connected with the office, first as clerk and afterwards as partner, since taking out his certificate in 1842.

Mr. HENRY SNOWDON, jud., solicitor, of Leeds, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

Mr. JOHN JONES, of Newtown, Montgomery, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

POWERS OF EXECUTOR.

Sir,—I should like some of your readers to consider this case:—

A. dies possessed of shares in a railway company, and standing in his name at the date of his death. By his will he bequeathed these shares absolutely to B., whom he appointed his sole executor. B., on the production of the probate, got them duly registered in his name, as executor of the deceased. He now wants to get them registered in his own name absolutely, irrespective of his character of executor, and has tendered a transfer deed from himself as executor to himself absolutely, for registration accordingly; but the company refuse to accept the transfer, alleging it to be void, on the ground that a person cannot transfer personal property to himself alone. Of course it is no answer to this company's argument, but it is a well-known fact, that transfers of this nature are made every day at the Bank of England and in many railway and other companies. The question for consideration then seems to be, "Can a person, in his character of executor, transfer shares in a company to himself in his individual capacity, without the intervention of a trustee?"

I may add that the recent Act does not affect this case, applying, as it does, only to cases of transfer by one person to himself and another or others.

SUBSCRIBER.

BOND OF MARRIED WOMAN.

Sir,—In your Journal of the 28th ult. appears a letter signed "B., A Subscriber and Constant Reader," who inquires whether there is any objection to a married woman (living apart from her husband, but not judicially separated) entering into a bond, with sureties, to secure a loan to her, so as to bind separate estate which she has no power to alienate. I think such a bond would be quite ineffectual to charge the separate estate, and that it is very doubtful whether the sureties would be in any way liable under it, the bond not being binding on the principal.

STAMP DUTY ON LEASES BILL.

Sir,—In our letter to you of last week "draft" leases was written by mistake for "all" leases.

SCADDING & SON.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

May 27.—Occupation of Land in Ireland.—The Earl of Longford presented a bill which would, he hoped, assist the discussion of the important measure about to come up to their lordship's House.—The bill was read a first time.

Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Bill.—The Archbishop of York withdrew his bill, in order to substitute another, which was read a first time.

The Churchwardens' Liability Bill.—The Marquis of Salisbury explained that the object of this measure was to relieve churchwardens from liability for the payment of fees, principally connected with the Archdeacon's Court, which, until the abolition of compulsory church-rates, were defrayed out of those rates. The fees at each visitation varied from 7s. to 20s., and churchwardens were often in a condition of life which made the payment inconvenient, while it was not fair to cast such a burden on persons whose services were gratuitous. As matters stood, there was danger of their not appearing at the Archdeacon's Court, though in that case their powers were invalid, or of difficulty in inducing persons to take the office. It had been suggested that the fees should be charged on the poor-rates, and a suit on that subject was now proceeding, but in the meantime it was only just to relieve the churchwardens.—The bill was read a second time.

The Bankrupt Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill.—The Marquis of Clanricarde moved that this bill be committed pro forma, in order that it might be reprinted with numerous verbal amendments suggested by a legal body in Ireland.—The Lord Chancellor had learnt, on communicating with the Irish law authorities, that there was considerable objection both to the shape and timeliness of the bill. It was desirable that the English and Irish law should be assimilated, especially as to non-traders; but the Act of last session had provided that a bankrupt should not obtain his discharge unless he had paid ten shillings in the pound, that the official assignees should be superseded by creditors' trustees, and that persons should not be adjudged bankrupt on their own petition. On this last point, as well as on others, the bill would tend rather to divergence than assimilation, and it was desirable that more time should be given to test the working of the English law before the Irish was assimilated to it.—The Marquis of Clanricarde said nine years ago the then Attorney-General for Ireland had promised to bring non-traders under the bankruptcy law, which was the chief provision of the bill, yet nothing had been done.—The bill passed through committee pro forma.

The Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal Bill.—The Earl of Kimberley moved the second reading. The Act of 1851, which this measure proposed to repeal, contained four clauses. The first declared and enacted that any brief or bull proceeding from the Pope pretending to establish any jurisdiction in this country should be void. The second imposed a penalty of £100 on the assumption of any ecclesiastical title under such pretended brief or bull; no suit, however, being brought without the consent of the Attorney-General. The third, which was not quite consistent with the rest of the Act, relieved from penalties the bishops of the Scotch Episcopal Church; and the fourth reserved the operation of the Charitable Bequests Act of 1844. The excitement under which that Act was passed had long passed away. As regarded the enforcement of penalties, the Act had been a dead letter, for no one had been sued; but it did not follow that the Act had been altogether ineffectual. It had been the cause of considerable inconvenience, and had, perhaps, to some extent accomplished the intentions of its promoters. As the penalties applied only to persons assuming the titles, the Act had not prevented the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, whether in England or Ireland, from being generally and ostentatiously called by their sees. It had to some extent obstructed charitable purposes, and had prevented cordial intercourse between our authorities and the spiritual rulers of the Romish Church. Circumstances had greatly changed. The Church of Ireland had been disestablished, and, after the 1st of January next, apart from the titles of precedence enjoyed by particular individuals who then held bishoprics, and who were saved by a special clause in last year's Act, bishops who might be appointed in that Church would come under the provisions of the Act of 1851. This bill was to remove the last shred of disability remaining after the Irish Church Act. The preamble expressly declared that no foreign power can confer authority within this realm, and that this repeal should in no wise sanction the conferring any such authority. The result, therefore, of the bill would be that, while the penalty of £100 specially directed by the Act of 1851 against any person assuming a title contrary to that Act would no longer be retained, the general law of the country, declaring that no foreign jurisdiction should have any power or dominion in this country, would remain precisely as it was before. If he thought the Act could in the least check the ridiculous and extravagant pretensions put forth by Rome in the late Syllabus and Schema, he would be no party to its repeal; he believed, however, that it added no security to the enjoyment of our own religion, and that the old law would be quite enough to mark the national determination that no foreign jurisdiction should be exercised.—Lord St. Leonards protested against the bill.—Earl Russell thought the present a most unfortunate time for introducing such a bill. He should vote against it, unless much amended in committee.—Lord Cairns was surprised to find that the section of the Catholic Emancipation Act (10 Geo. 4), which imperilled the Irish bishops, was not touched by the bill. Moreover, that part of the bill which purported to continue the penalty against persons assuming titles in places where English bishops already held them would be objected to as inconsistent with the preamble.—The Lord Chancellor answered the objection that, after the present year, those Irish bishops whose titles were continued to them for their lives would be subjected to penalties, by urging that, on the true construction of the 24th section of the Act of 1829, the title of an Irish bishop would not come within the purview of the Act, because, the Irish Church having been disestablished, the designation would be one with which the law had nothing to do. The law could not object to the assumption of a title by the head of any religious society. The principle on which the Government acted was this: on the one hand they would not recognise any authority whatever in the persons calling themselves by such titles, but, on the other hand they would not inflict any penalty on a man for assuming a title which did not belong to the Established Church. But confusion might arise from two persons calling themselves by the same title, one being fictitious and the other having authority by law; and the assumption of the title in such a case would be both misleading and indecorous. No such difficulty could be created by the assumption of such a title as Archbishop of Westminster, and therefore the bill would apply only to the taking of such titles as did not clash with others.—Lord St. Leonards would withdraw his motion in the hope that in committee the bill might be so amended as to meet his views.—Lord Oranmore, while he altogether repudiated Ultramontane ideas, desired that every Roman Catholic should enjoy liberty and equality with all other subjects of the Queen. There were strong reasons for not passing this bill.—The Duke of Richmond said that in assenting to the second reading of this bill it was especially desired that the decision might not be construed as in any way offering homage to the Papal authority, nor as offering facilities for the government of the country being carried on under a Roman Catholic clergy. The bill would require very considerable amendment in committee.—The bill was read a second time.

The Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Bill was read a second time.

The Mortgage Debenture Act (1865) Amendment Bill was read a second time.

The Railways (Powers and Construction) Bill went through committee.

The Bridgwater and Beverley Disfranchisement Bill.—The Duke of Richmond and Lord Colchester censured the conduct of the Bridgwater Commissioners.—The Lord Chancellor did not think it necessary to take up the time of the House in defending the gentlemen who had undertaken the office of commissioners of inquiry at Bridgwater, because never was there a case so bad and so black as that of Bridgwater.—The bill was read a second time.

May 30.—The High Court of Justice Bill.—Committee.—The Lord Chancellor said that the judges, in the communication received from them, for which the bill had been postponed, had recommended that the rules should form part of the bill, but it was impossible to pass such a bulk through the Houses, numbering as the other House did 100 lawyers, by whom every rule would have to be discussed. That would be a mere waste of time. The bill originally proposed that the rules should be framed by the Court itself, but in deference to the objection that the judges had not the requisite time or leisure, he thought it best to entrust the work to a committee of the Privy Council, to include the Lord Chancellor, as the person charged with the duty of attending to measures for the amendment of the law, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who alone could properly determine the expenditure proper for achieving the work. It was never his intention to refer the question to those two officers alone, but he contemplated that they should have the assistance of many legal members of the Privy Council, and should continue to have the power of making and altering rules. The Lord Chief Justice, however, had strongly objected to this proposal as unconstitutional, urging that times might change and that it might be of the utmost importance to keep the independence of the courts wholly free from any influence of the Crown; Now, while seeing no cause for serious apprehension on this point, he proposed to get over the difficulty. The Lord Chief Justice had remarked that it would be very different if such a body were only to start rules, leaving afterwards to the Court complete power of modifying them, and this was what he now proposed. In the first instance the framing of the rules must be attended with considerable expense, and he proposed to entrust it to a committee of the Privy Council, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the chiefs of the three Common Law Courts, the Judge of the Court of Probate, the Judge of the Court of Admiralty, and such other members as might be thought fit. The rules, it was provided, must necessarily be framed before the Courts came into operation, and this was fixed for Michaelmas Term, 1871. When once launched, the High Court would be able to add to or vary the rules, submitting such alterations to the Committee of the Privy Council, and of course laying them before Parliament. Moreover, to meet the wish of the Lord Chief Justice and other judges, that criminal business should be left as far as possible to the Court over which he so ably presided, he proposed so to amend the bill as to keep that high and ancient officer as president of one division, and to direct that as far as was consistent with the other provisions of the bill, criminal business should be allotted to that court over which the Lord Chief Justice should preside. The qualifying words were necessary on account of some matters, such as an indictment against a railway company for stopping up a road, being technically criminal, but really civil. He had received numerous applications expressing a desire that the bill should pass as speedily as possible, from mercantile bodies, from four or five large bodies of attorneys in the north, from the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, and from the Society for the Amendment of the Law; the resolution of this last body having been adopted at one of the largest meetings it had known, presided over by Mr. Mellish, an eminent member of the Common Law Bar. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no further delay.—Lord Cairns approved the alterations in the bill as far as they went, but doubted whether it would be wise to proceed with it this session. Parliament ought not to delegate to a committee of the Privy Council the framing of rules and principles which went to the root of all judicature. It would be impossible to put the Act into operation until a proper building was provided in which all the courts could sit.—Lord Westbury satirised the frequent changes in the bill, and recommended the Lord Chancellor to withdraw it, and to introduce into it the rules and regulations which he now proposed to refer to the Privy Council. The bill was not to come into operation until November, 1871, and if this advice were adopted there need be no delay. If the bill were passed he should have nothing to do with its further progress.—Lord Penzance said that it was beyond the competence of Parliament to deal with all these technical rules of procedure. Still he disapproved a reference in the second instance to the Privy Council; he would rather leave the judges to amend the rules according to their experience and the necessity of the case.—The Duke of Richmond hoped that if the Lord Chancellor refused to withdraw the bill for the present session Lord Cairns would take the sense of the House against it on the third reading.—Lord Granville would not much care to sit and hear the law Lords displaying their ingenuity, and forensic skill in tearing to pieces these technical clauses.—Lord Salisbury said they ought not to delegate to a body over which they had no control, functions which touched so deeply the power of Parliament and the principles of the Constitution.—Lord Romilly, while approving the principle of the bill, agreed that it had better be postponed.—The Lord Chancellor said that the opposition given to this bill would not encourage the Government to originate its law bills in that House. He defended the bill. Not a single principle of it had been changed, and it would be a sheer waste of the strength of Parliament to introduce 400 or 500 clauses embodying the rules and procedure of the High Court of Justice. To postpone it till next session would be to postpone indefinitely a measure which the whole legal profession agreed in desiring.—Lord Cairns said he should oppose the third reading. The bill was framed on erroneous principles.—The bill passed through committee.

The Sequestration Bill passed through committee.

The Mortgage Debenture Act (1865) Amendment Bill passed through committee.

The Railways (Powers and Construction) Bill was read a first time and passed.

The Irish Land Bill was read a first time.

May 31.—The New Dictionary.—The Lord Chancellor presented a bill intended to give effect to the report of the Ritual Commission on this subject. The bill was read a first time.

The High Court of Justice Bill.—Lord Cairns gave notice that on the report of this bill as amended he should move a resolution, by way of amendment, staying its further progress.

The Felony Bill.—Lord Westbury moved the second reading. By a great number of statutes the Crown had been permitted to mitigate the operation of the penalty of forfeiture of property on conviction of treason or felony, by making grants for the benefit of the convict's family and other purposes. In minor cases it had long been the practice not to seize goods and chattels with a view of deriving any profits from them, but to deal with them in a merciful manner for the purpose of meeting the necessities of the convict's family. The bill proposed that henceforth such property should be vested in an administrator to be appointed by the Crown, and that it should first of all be liable to defray the costs of the prosecutor, if he had not been otherwise entirely reimbursed. It proposed that the property should next be liable for the payment of debts justly due by the convict at the time of his conviction, thus remedying the anomalous state of the law under which creditors, unless they had obtained judgment, were debarred payment, no matter how large the amount of personal property which the convict had forfeited. The bill next proposed that the administrator should be empowered to make compensation to a limited extent to any person defrauded or injured by the criminal act of the convict; and, lastly, that he should make allowances for the support of the convict, who might be at large under a ticket-of-leave, and for the support of his family. The administration would operate until the sentence pronounced, or any sentence substituted for it, had been fully completed, or until a pardon had been issued. During this period any property accruing to the convict would come within the possession and control of the administrator, who, on the expiration of the term, would be bound to restore to the convict all that remained of his property, and to give him a full account of his administration. There was a provision empowering the Court, in cases where the property was small, to appoint the administrator. The second clause directed that conviction for treason or felony should be attended with the forfeiture of any office, pension, public employment or emolument derived out of any public funds, and also with disqualification for any public employment under the Crown, whether naval, military, or civil, and for any ecclesiastical benefice. The disqualification would also extend to sitting in Parliament, and to any Parliamentary or municipal franchise. He thought their lordships would recognise the expediency of dealing with the property of felons in a systematic manner, and the bill, after undergoing the ordeal of a select committee in the other House, had received the approval of the Home Secretary. He proposed to defer the committee for a fortnight in order that the provisions of the bill might be fully considered. The Lord Chancellor said that the principle of the bill was one which all their lordships would approve, and that the select committee by whom its details had been scrutinised was so constituted as to entitle it to confidence. The bill was read a second time.

The Norwich Voters Disfranchisement Bill passed through committee.

The Bridgewater and Beverley Disfranchisement Bill passed through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

May 27.—False Weights and Measures.—Lord E. Cecil moved, "That this House is of opinion that the present state of the law as regards the use of false weights and measures, and the prevention and punishing of adulteration of food, drink, and drugs, is most unsatisfactory, and demands the early attention of her Majesty's Government."—Mr. T. Hughes seconded the motion, which, after some ventilation, was withdrawn.

The Burials Bill.—Committee.—In consequence of the lateness of the hour and the opposition to the bill, the debate was adjourned before the first clause had been considered.

The Public Schools Bill.—Adjourned debate again adjourned.

May 28.—The New Law Courts.—In answer to Alderman Lawrence, Mr. Ayrton said the plans were far advanced; they involved difficult questions and had taken more time than he expected. A plan should be produced by the time any vote was asked.

The Magistracy of Lancashire.—In reply to Mr. Cross, Mr. Gladstone said it had been felt that the mode of appointing magistrates in the county of Lancaster recently introduced had not been satisfactory, without attaching any blame to any party or any person in particular. In former times the magistrates of the county of Lancaster were appointed, like all other county magistrates, on the recommendation of the lord lieutenant of the county, only that the chancellor of the duchy discharged the same function on the part of the Crown as the Lord Chancellor discharged in the case of other counties. It had been arranged simply to return to that ancient practice.

Copyright Arrangements with America.—In reply to Mr. Macfie, Mr. Otway said that, as negotiations were still pending on the subject between her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States, it was impossible now to state what the tenour of those arrangements would be. The question was difficult, and the Secretary of State desired to confer with certain eminent authors and publishers on the subject. The General International Copyright Act might be put in operation by the Crown by order in council in favour of any country which conceded reciprocal advantages to this country. A convention with the United States would be within the power given by that Act, and therefore would not necessitate further legislation on the subject.

The Court of Appeal in Chancery.—Mr. Winterbotham asked the Attorney-General whether his attention had been called to the state of the Court of Appeal in Chancery; and whether he was aware that there had been only one Lord Justice of Appeal since August last; that causes could be heard on appeal only by two Lords Justices sitting together, or by the Lord Chancellor; that the Lord Chancellor had sat only upon eleven days, or fragments of days, since the 23rd of March, and had in that time heard only one cause; that forty-seven causes were already waiting to be heard on appeal, and if he supposed that they would be heard before the long vacation, considering the present state of the Court of Appeal; whether his attention had been drawn to the fact that there being only one Lord Justice causes on appeal from the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster could not be heard except by making the Chancellor of the Duchy, who was not a lawyer, one of the Judges of Appeal; whether he was aware that dissatisfaction was felt at motions being heard on appeal by one Lord Justice sitting alone; whether the Government intended at once to appoint another Lord Justice in the place of the late Lord Justice Selwyn; and by what prerogative the Crown abstained from filling up judicial posts created by statute.—The Attorney-General said that of course he was aware of the fact stated in the first question. In respect of the statement that the Lord Chancellor had only sat eleven days or fragments of days since the 23rd of March, and in that time had only heard one cause, he had to observe that he had been informed that one cause was an exceptionally long one. He was aware that forty-seven causes were already waiting to be heard on appeal, but he believed they had been only entered four months ago—in February. He was informed by the Lord Chancellor that he intended to sit during the Whitsuntide recess, and that his Lordship expected all the appeals would be cleared off before the long vacation. There was some difficulty with respect to appeals from the Duchy of Lancaster; but those appeals were very rare. There had been only one for a long time, and that of itself would hardly justify the appointment of another judge, if there were not other reasons for such an appointment. He was asked whether he was aware that dissatisfaction was felt at motions being heard on appeal by one Lord Justice sitting alone. In reply, he had to say that he was not aware of such dissatisfaction. With regard to the inquiry as to whether the Government intended to appoint at once another Lord Justice in the place of the late Lord Justice Selwyn, he need not remind the House that two bills of a very important character were now pending in the House of Lords. If those bills should pass, the office to which the question of his hon. and learned friend related would be put an end to, or, at all events, be considerably changed. Under those circumstances, the Government would not feel justified in at once appointing another Lord Justice; but, in the event of such an appointment becoming necessary, it was not improbable that a short bill would be introduced to enable the Government to make an appointment of the kind for a limited period. To the last question he had to reply that it did not require a prerogative of the Crown to enable the Crown to dispense with the exercise of a prerogative.

The Irish Land Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Stamp Duties Bill was read a second time.

The Game Licences Bill was read a second time.

The Married Women's Property Bill was read a third time and passed.

May 31.—The Benefices Bill was read a third time and passed.

The House adjourned till June 9.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

UNITED LAW CLERKS' SOCIETY.

The annual festival of this society was held on Friday evening, May 27th, at the Freemasons'-hall, Great Queen-street, when a goodly number of members—about 300—dined together under the presidency of Vice-Chancellor Sir W. M. James. The attendance of visitors was not so numerous as on some former occasions, but the company included Dr. Vaughan, the Master of the Temple, the Rev. F. F. Statham, the Hon. Mr. Romilly, Dr. Spinks, Q.C., Mr. Secondary Potter, Mr. J. N. Higgins, Mr. Butler Rigby, Mr. J. Edwards, Mr. F. A. Philbrick, Mr. W. M. Walters, Mr. J. S. Addison, Mr. J. G. Lewis, Mr. J. Watson, Mr. N. C. Milne, Dr. Stallard, Mr. Reep, Mr. Brodrick, Mr. Flood, &c.

After the health of "The Queen" and "The Prince and Princess of Wales" had been proposed in appropriate terms and cordially received,

The CHAIRMAN gave "The Army, Navy and Volunteers." He said that most of those whom he saw around him were men of peace, and if any members of either the army or navy were present he hoped they would pardon him for expressing a hope that there would be little opportunity for them to show of what sterling stuff they were made, and that those who had to perform the functions of legal advisers to the great powers would give to their clients the same advice which his friends present he knew were in the habit of giving to all who would take it, viz., to keep out of litigation, and especially of that kind in which the appeal was to wage of battle. He could not forget, however, that amongst their own ranks there were a great many volunteers; and, remembering the old story of the Quaker, who—though forbidden by his principles to engage in strife—when the vessel in which he was a passenger was attacked by a privateer, had no scruple in pushing one of the assailants overboard, with the words, "Thee has no business here," so he hoped the volunteers, though pre-eminently men of peace, would, if any hostile force ventured to break and enter into our soil, close and freehold, show that they had learned the maxim, "Molliter manus imposuit," and say, "Friends, you have no business here."

Mr. JOHN EDWARDS having suitably responded on behalf of the volunteers,

The CHAIRMAN rose to propose the toast of the evening—"Prosperity to the United Law Clerks' Society." It was said that every English Protestant of any means had a father confessor in his attorney or solicitor; and it was certainly true that to all branches of the profession the most important rights of property and the most important secrets of titles and families were necessarily confided. Few, except those who knew the inner working of the professional labours of solicitors, knew how much of that secret confidence was necessarily reposed in the humbler members of the profession—the law clerks, and how honourably and conscientiously that trust was fulfilled. (Cheers.) Those who filled the office such as he had the honour now to hold knew very well how much of the work of the profession was necessarily done by that class; work which was not done in the light of day—not before the footlights of the stage—not to listening senates or applauding audiences; but their labours were performed in the murky recesses of dark chambers and ill-lighted offices; and in such places they discharged those duties with an ability, zeal and conscientiousness which, personally, he was only too ready to acknowledge, and to which he had been personally greatly indebted. Unfortunately, however, it was a profession which, from the very nature of the case, was, at the very best, but slenderly remunerated, and too often but very inadequately paid. The means of the great number of law clerks are but scanty at the best, and they were exposed to double vicissitudes. Their own health might fail, their intellects might be overworked, or they might be suddenly cut off. And they were also exposed to the same vicissitudes which might occur to their employers, and then the clerks had to suffer, being thrown out upon the world, and very often finding great difficulty in obtaining a similar position to that which they had lost. These circumstances, some years ago, had struck a few good, active and enthusiastic men, who founded the Law Clerks' Society, a society which even now was but young, for it was his professional junior by one year, for he found that, whereas he was called to the bar in 1831, this society came into existence in the year 1832. It began with the efforts of a few enthusiastic men, who said to the clerks, Help yourselves and help will be found for you; and they also said to the employers—to barristers as well as to solicitors—to those to whom the lottery of life had assigned the higher prizes of the profession, Help these poor fellows to help themselves. Such was the appeal that was made on one side; and how successfully that appeal was made was shown by the report which had been handed round, and which was to be taken as read as part of the proceedings of the evening. He must say that he should wish it to be taken as read as part of his speech, for a more eloquent statement or a more powerful appeal on behalf of the society it was impossible to form than was contained in this simple, unpretending narrative of that which the society was, that which it had done, and that which it had now grown up to. He would therefore consider that he had read it to the meeting as part of his address, and, having done so, he might be allowed to say that he did not think it would do the society any harm if he let the meeting into what he conceived to be the great secret of its success. The founders and promoters of the society had applied to one of the strongest feelings which animated the English heart, even if it did not that of the whole of the human species, viz., the strong desire which everyone seemed to have to get a great deal more than their money's worth for their money. They said to the young men, We know it is very hard upon you, it will be an effort of self-denial to begin out of your small means making the necessary savings to entitle you to be a participating member of this society; but then, if you do make the effort, we will add another pound to your pound, and so you will really get twice your money's worth. That was certainly a great temptation to them. On the other hand, they said to the employers, Assist these clerks, for every pound you give them will lead to their giving a pound for themselves; so that if you subscribe you will get twice the benefit. Everything, therefore, told twice in that way, to say nothing of this further consideration, which he thought was a very strong one, that the employers after all got a great deal more than their money's worth, because they secured the services of a set of men who had shown the prudence and self-denial which these men must have shown in order to obtain for themselves the benefits of this society. How well this motive might now be presented was shown by the present state of the finances. To any young men who might be hesitating whether or no they should join, he would say, Look here, there are £40,000 and upwards in hand to secure your full share of benefit for anything which you subscribe; and, on the other hand, to those who are asked to contribute in the way of donations or subscriptions to this most excellent society, it might be said, In return for what has been given, the young men have themselves subscribed during the last year more than £2,000. There was an old French proverb which said there is nothing that succeeds like success; and he hoped that the present amount of success was only the omen of the still greater prosperity of the society; in future that the donations would stimulate the subscriptions, and that the subscriptions in their turn would stimulate the donations, until perhaps it would not be unreasonable for him to hope that after the lapse of some thirty years more, somebody who had then arrived at his position, having now just been called to the bar, might then fill the chair and say, looking back to the present day. Those were the days of the society's infancy, since then see what we have grown into. He hoped that such would be the result of the past and present efforts, and before sitting down he would only take leave to say, that though he was a little disappointed at finding that his friend, the Master of the Rolls, who had promised to attend, was not able to be present, still he had sent him a note expressing his regret, and asking him to present on his behalf an additional donation of ten guineas to the fund.

Mr. JOSEPH ADDISON proposed the next toast, "The Lord Chancellor and Patrons of the Society." He said that on looking over the list of patrons he found amongst them the names of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chelmsford, and he was quite sure that not only in no assembly of lawyers, but in no assembly of Englishmen, would such names be received in any but the most cordial manner. The Lord Chancellor was known to them all; his high legal attainments and the dignity and kindness of his manner had endeared him to every member of the profession, for not even a lawyer's clerk could go before him who was not treated with kindness and respect. Lord Chelmsford also, whether as a sailor, a barrister, leader of the bar, senator, Lord Chancellor, or as a member of the highest assembly in the realm, had gained the respect and esteem of everyone with whom he came in contact. He thought the society had a right to be proud of two such patrons, who, notwithstanding the differences of their views in politics and in many other matters, met together to forward the interests of the Law Clerks' Society.

Dr. SPINKS, being called upon to respond, said he also had looked at the list of patrons, but had not found himself much assisted thereby, inasmuch as he was not able to picture to himself what were the feelings of a Lord Chancellor or a past Lord Chancellor? However, he apprehended the health of these high legal luminaries was proposed not because of their exalted station, but as being patrons of the society, and if he ever should attain to the same distinction he should consider it one of the proudest positions he could hold, because it would show that he had won the respect of every member of the profession to which he belonged; and having attained such a position he should consider it no more than his duty to lend what aid his name could afford to a society so well worthy of assistance. He must still, however, say that the true patronage of the society was in the hearts of its members. Any who were not already members he would urge to become so, and would ask them to bear in mind that the greatest benefit they would thereby derive was not merely the obtaining two pounds for one, but the peace of mind which ensued upon making provision for the day of sorrow, and which alone could enable a man to do his duty faithfully and fearlessly in whatever sphere he was placed.

The list of donations, amounting on the whole to about £300, was here read by the secretary, Mr. Rogers, amidst repeated marks of approbation from the audience.

Mr. J. NAPIER HIGGINS proposed the health of the chairman, not as a new friend of the society, but as an old benefactor. He would not attempt to make a speech, but on behalf of the members of the society with which he had for some years been identified he might express their gratitude for the dignified manner in which the duties of the Chairman had been discharged. He would not attempt to describe what he had done for the society, but he might be permitted as a member of the bar to say that there was no one who had not a good word for him, when he was raised from the ranks to the elevated position which he now held, and although he had now reached the bench, and a marked line was thus drawn between him and his ancient fellows, he had not forgotten the body of men of whom he had spoken so feelingly that evening. He was sorry that he was not supported by more members of the bar, but he knew that many had taken advantage of next day being a holiday to go out of town.

The CHAIRMAN, in responding, said it would be very pleasing to him if anything he could do or say was of any permanent or practical benefit to the society in whose cause they were assembled, and in acceding to the request which had been made to him to preside on that occasion he had felt it to be one of the duties attached to the position to which he had by good fortune attained, to do all that lay in his power to assist the humbler and more struggling members of the profession. As to the broad line of demarcation which Mr. Higgins had spoken of, he must say he was not aware of its existence, for he still considered himself a member of the English bar, whose duty it was to perform the functions connected with the administration of justice, though he now sat on the other side of the well to that which he formerly occupied.

Dr. VAUGHAN, in proposing "The Bench, the Bar, and the Profession," said he was happy to think that the days were not yet come when an English clergyman was out of place in an assembly of lawyers, and he did not believe that any of the perils with which his church was now-a-days threatened would alter her position so long as she did her duty in the hearts and affections of Englishmen. It had been his good fortune, during the course of his career, to have been acquainted with judges, barristers, and solicitors, and he could say with truth that as the bench was the dream of his childhood, and as the bar was the ambition of his youth, so in his later days he counted it a great boon to be brought back to minister in another sphere amongst those honoured men in whose ranks he had once expected his own name would have been enrolled. He could scarcely imagine any one less worthy to give the toast with which his name had been associated unless it were from the deep reverence with which he regarded the one, and the admiration which he had ever felt for the oratory of the other, and the deep esteem which in many parts of the country he had had to foster for many of the solicitors and attorneys of England. He had often heard it said, by one of the most distinguished men of the bench, that judges felt they had to rely upon the bar for a large part of the efficiency with which they were able to discharge their duties, and in the same way he believed the bar were always ready to acknowledge the assistance which they received from the solicitors; and he might also go a step further and say there was probably not a solicitor in the room who would not acknowledge that he was under a deep obligation to his responsible clerks—that branch of the profession which was one grade above that to which he counted it a great privilege to be permitted to minister; and he might venture to say that amongst some of those junior clerks he found abilities and good qualities which might eventually raise them to a position in which they would adorn the bar if not the bench.

Mr. F. A. PHILBRICK, who was called upon to acknowledge the toast, said he fully concurred in the truth of what had fallen from Dr. Vaughan, that the profession of the law always had in itself the germs of education for all its branches. He might illustrate this by reference to his own experience, when in times gone by, as a law clerk, he had sat up late to engross a deed or copy a brief, and he could well understand, from old association and from his intimate connection with those who formed the bulk of the assembly which he had the honour of addressing, that deep sense of honour, that strong fidelity, and that unswerving love of truth which characterised the profession as a whole, and which he believed permeated every branch.

The health of "The Hon. Stewards" was afterwards proposed by Mr. BUTLER RIGBY, and acknowledged by Mr. WM. WALTERS. Dr. STALLARD proposed "The Trustees," and the Rev. F. F. STATHAM proposed "The Ladies," which concluded the proceedings.

The musical arrangements, under the direction of Mr. Chaplin Henry, gave great and general satisfaction.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

The next meeting will be held on Wednesday, the 8th of June, 1870, at 8 p.m., precisely, when Mr. F. Worsley will open a discussion on "The Liability for Accidents of Masters, including Railway Companies." Mr. Charles Clark will preside.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society held on Tuesday last, the 31st of May, Mr. L. Hunter in the chair, the question for discussion was No. 455 Legal:—"Is a solicitor mortgagee, who acts for himself in a redemption suit, entitled to costs, beyond those out of pocket?" Price v. McBeth, 12 W. R. 818, 33 L. J. Ch. 460; Sclater v. Cottam, 5 W. R. 744. Mr. Galloway opened the debate in the affirmative, and Mr. A. G. Harvie, in the negative; and after a well-sustained discussion the society decided the question in the affirmative.*

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Trinity Term, 1870.

The final examination of candidates took place on the 30th and 31st of May, at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, London.

The examiners were the Master Benett, of the Court of Common Pleas, Mr. Frederic Ouvry, Mr. John Henry Bolton, Mr. Edward Frederick, Burton, and Mr. John Young.

QUESTIONS.

I.—COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. On what contracts is an infant liable; and is a father liable on contracts of his infant son, under any, and if any, what circumstances?
2. Explain the difference between penalties and liquidated damages?
3. What is a tender? How should it be made, and what is the effect of encumbering it with any conditions or reservations?
4. Under what circumstances is interest recoverable on a debt?
5. A married woman is entitled to money secured to her by a bond; who is entitled to the money in the event of the death of either the husband in the lifetime of the wife, or of the wife in the lifetime of the husband, before the debt is paid?
6. Is it necessary to call the attesting witness (if any) to prove the execution of a deed or written instrument, under any, and if any, what circumstances?
7. What is a set-off; and give instances in which cross demands can, and cannot, be set-off against each other?
8. What are the limits of the jurisdiction of the county courts, and what are the amounts which the plaintiff must recover in actions founded on contract, and on tort respectively, to entitle him to his costs if he sue in the superior court?
9. When several actions are brought by the same plaintiff against several defendants in respect of the same cause of action (as, for instance, against several underwriters on a policy of insurance), how can the defendants avoid the expense of several trials of the same question?
10. What is the meaning of "the venue," and explain the different kinds of venue.
11. How long does a writ of summons remain in force; and how is it kept in force if it cannot be served within the time; and within what time is a plaintiff out of court, if he takes no further step after the service of the writ?
12. A. obtains a judgment against B., to whom C. is indebted. Is there any mode in which A. can get C.'s debt to B. applied in or towards payment of the amount of his judgment against B.? and if so, explain the proceeding.
13. What steps should be taken to enforce payment of money under an order for payment made by a judge, or master at chambers?

14. If a person is sued for £50 of which he admits that he owes £30, but did not tender it before action, what steps should he take to avoid further liability for costs in the event of the plaintiff recovering no more than the £30?

15. Describe the proceeding to be taken for the protection of a person having money or goods in his possession, in which he has no interest, but which two or more other persons separately claim from him.

II.—CONVEYANCING.

1. State the ordinary trusts of a marriage settlement, the gentleman settling £10,000, the lady £5,000.
2. To what extent may a vendor, selling by auction, bid, or authorise biddings to be made on his behalf?
3. For what period of time may real estate be settled so as to be inalienable?
4. Can a married woman dispose of her reversionary interest in personal estate, and if she can, how is she so empowered, and by what means?
5. Can trustees or executors, in the absence of any power for the purpose in the instrument creating the trust, invest the trust funds in real securities in any part of the United Kingdom?
6. In the case of a sale by trustees, under a power with the consent of the tenant for life of the property, what are the covenants that the trustees and tenant for life may respectively be required to enter into?
7. When a legacy is left to an infant, and there is no trustee of the will, how should the executor deal with such legacy?
8. Where a mortgagor is in the occupation of the property intended to be mortgaged, how should the payment of interest be secured to the mortgagee, beyond the covenant of the mortgagor?
9. What are easements? Specify some.
10. You have to sell a leasehold house by auction,—state shortly the usual conditions of sale.
11. Can an infant in any case convey land, and if so, in what way?
12. A gentleman has several children, all infants, the eldest of whom is of weak mind. The gentleman and his wife have power to appoint by deed their marriage settlement funds, amounting to £20,000 to all, or any one, or more, exclusively of the others of their children, the husband, or wife surviving having a like power of appointment by deed or will. The gentleman has £12,000 of his own, and desires to make some provision for the eldest child. How would you advise him to do this, having regard to the child's state of mind?
13. In the case of a bequest of a sum of money to the heirs of a person; who will be entitled, there being nothing explanatory in the context of the will?
14. Define a shifting use.
15. State the principal incidents of copyhold tenure.

III.—EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. How did it happen that equity became administered separately upon principles and rules, some of which conflict with those of the common law? and what does the word equity in legal phrase import?
2. What are the courts in which equity is now administered, and what appeals lie from them respectively?
3. Within what limit of time can a cestui que trust claim a trust fund or arrears of dividends from his trustee?
4. In mortgages of real estate, is a mortgagee entitled to be repaid his mortgage money primarily out of the personal estate of a deceased mortgagor, or how otherwise: has there not been some change in the law in this respect?
5. If a mortgagee allows the mortgagor through ignorance or negligence to retain in his hands the title deeds of the property in mortgage, can such mortgagee enforce the priority of his security to a subsequent incumbrancer of the same property without notice?
6. Can a plaintiff, suitor in England, carry on proceedings for the same objects in both common law and equity courts, with any and what exception; and can the doctrine of election be forced upon him by a defendant, and what does the word election mean?
7. What approach has been made by the Legislature during the present reign to endow courts of equity with common law powers; and also the common law courts with powers exercised only theretofore in equity, with a view of promoting an amalgamation of the two systems?

* We believe that in practice the taxing-masters decide the question in the affirmative; and we think that it is more the interest of the mortgagor that this should be so, than that the mortgagee should take the mortgage in the name of a third person.—ED. S. J.

8. State some of the most striking differences from the common law that exist in our equitable system with regard to the rights of property of married women, and the protection afforded them by courts of equity. State also some of the advantages possessed by equity over the common law by bringing suits for the specific performance of contracts, and for discovery and other ordinary transactions.

9. On the other hand, are there not cases where courts of equity can afford no relief? What are they?

10. What are the three principal objects of relief to which courts of equity apply themselves by granting injunctions against proceedings in courts of law?

11. But equity is said to follow the law. Does it not sometimes go beyond the law, as in the case of trusts executory? What are they?

12. What is the rule of succession to real and personal property: is the first governed by the domicile of the last owner, or by the law of the country where the property is situate; and is the second affected by it, not being within the four seas?

13. What is the law that governs contracts? and as a general rule, can a contract that is void by the law of the country where it is made be enforced here?

14. Give an outline of the steps from the filing of a bill in chancery to perpetuate testimony to the end of the proceedings by a suitor claiming, and proving himself to be entitled on the happening of any future event, to any honour, title, or estate, when the right cannot be brought to trial before the happening of such event, and how is the defendant to obtain his costs of such a suit? Is any decree made in such a case?

15. What is a motion for decree, when may it be made, and to whom?

IV.—BANKRUPTCY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. Are stock brokers, farmers and graziers liable to be made bankrupts as traders or non-traders?

2. State the principal matters in regard to which the bankrupt laws affect differently traders and non-traders.

3. What are the matters to be transacted at the first meeting?

4. Can a creditor, holding security, be a petitioning creditor, and can he vote on the choice of trustee?

5. How will the rights of the grantee, under a bill of sale, be affected by the bankruptcy of the grantor, and by the omission to register; and will it make any difference if the grantor be not a trader; or if the grantee have removed the goods before the bankruptcy?

6. If the manufactory of the bankrupt be mortgaged, what are the rights of the trustee as regards trade fixtures, and fixed machinery?

7. Can a proof be made against a bankrupt's estate for unliquidated damages in any and what cases?

8. What is stoppage in transitu; and under what circumstances may it be resorted to?

9. What are the principal acts of a bankrupt which constitute misdemeanours, or felony?

10. By what means, other than bankruptcy, can a debtor obtain a discharge from his debts?

11. What is the position of an equitable mortgagee of the bankrupt's real estate as regards the realisation of his security?

12. On the bankruptcy of a firm, how is the property of the partnership, and of the individual partners administered?

13. In what position does the landlord of the bankrupt stand, as regards his claim for rent?

14. Within what time must the act of bankruptcy on which an adjudication is founded have been committed?

15. What are the provisions of the recent act, as regards the leaseholds, or onerous contracts, or property of the bankrupt?

V.—CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES.

1. If a person unlawfully and maliciously destroys or injures a statue, bust, vase, or other work of art in any museum, or library, or in any building belonging to any university or college, what is the nature of the offence committed, and how is it punishable?

2. In an indictment, or summary proceeding for a malicious injury to property, is proof of malice against the owner of the property essential?

3. What is the rule of law with regard to inferring a guilty intention in the parties accused?

4. What is the definition of a principal in the first degree?

5. If a married woman commit a crime in the presence of her husband is she liable to be punished?

6. Can the wife of a member of a friendly society be convicted if she steal the money of the society deposited in a box in her husband's custody, which box is kept locked by the stewards, of whom he is not one?

7. Is compounding a mere charge of felony illegal?

8. What proof is requisite in order to excuse a person from punishment on the ground of insanity?

9. What is the legal distinction between murder and manslaughter?

10. What is the evidence necessary to sustain an indictment for burglary?

11. Is an unstamped receipt admissible in evidence to prove a criminal charge?

12. What is the ordinary evidence required to prove guilty knowledge in uttering a forged instrument?

13. On an indictment and conviction for arson, does the punishment differ in the cases of the premises being inhabited or not?

14. What description of false representation constitutes the offence of obtaining money or chattels by false pretences?

15. Under what circumstances is the receipt of stolen goods punishable?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS AT THE FINAL EXAMINATION FOR HILARY TERM, 1870.

I.—COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By E. A. C. SCHALCH, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. An infant is liable only on his contracts for necessities; a father is never liable on the contracts of his infant son by reason of the relationship between them. A father may, of course, authorise his son whether under age or of full age to contract for him, and then the contract is the father's and not the son's. The father is then liable as principal in the same way that he would be liable if he had authorised any other agent to contract for him.

2. When the parties to a contract agree that a certain sum shall be paid on a breach of the contract by the person breaking it, and it appears that the amount thus specified is really intended as ascertained damages for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of deciding after the breach, the real amount due as damages for the breach, the damages are called liquidated damages, and the party guilty of the breach is liable to pay the amount thus fixed.

If, however, the sum agreed upon is a mere penalty to be inflicted as a kind of punishment upon the person breaking the agreement, and the amount of the sum has no reference to the amount of the actual damage caused or likely to be caused by the breach, then the damages are regarded as a penalty, and the party guilty of the breach is not liable to pay the amount so fixed, but is only bound to pay damages to the amount of the damage actually caused by his breach of contract. In other words the Courts allow parties to fix beforehand the amount of damages that are to be paid for a breach of contract, but they will not enforce a penalty. A bond in the ordinary form by which in effect the obligor binds himself to pay a sum of money on a given day under a penalty of double the amount is a good instance of a penalty. Such penalty cannot be enforced. A clause in a lease, by which the lessee agrees not to use the premises in a particular way, but if he does so use them to pay an additional rent, is an instance of liquidated damages which can be recovered.

3. A tender is an offer by a debtor to his creditor on the day the debt falls due of the amount of the debt. The actual sum due should be offered in coin or in Bank of England notes. Generally the effect of encumbering a tender with conditions or reservations is to render it void as a tender.

4. Interest may be recovered by statute or at common law. By 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28, a jury, if they shall think fit, may (1) give interest on all debts payable by virtue of a writing at a certain time; (2), or if the debt is payable otherwise then from the time when demand of payment shall have been made in writing so as such demand shall give notice to the debtor that interest will be claimed from the date of such demand until the time of payment. By section 29 the jury may, if they think fit, give damages in the nature of interest in all actions on policies of assurance. At common law interest is recoverable by the usage of trade, as on bills or notes; also interest is recoverable on bonds and on mortgages, and when there is an express or implied contract between the parties that interest is to be paid.

5. If the husband dies in the lifetime of the wife, she becomes absolutely entitled to the moneys which were never vested in the husband, as it always remained a chose in action which he did not reduce into possession. If the wife dies first, the husband takes the money absolutely as the administrator of his wife.

6. It used formerly to be necessary to call the attesting witness (if any) to a deed in order to prove it, whether or not the deed required attestation. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 28, now provides: "It shall not be necessary to prove by the attesting witness any instrument to the validity of which attestation is not requisite; and such instrument may be proved by admission or otherwise as if there had been no attesting witness." It is, however, still necessary to call the attesting witness when the instrument is one to the validity of which attestation is requisite.

7. A set-off is a debt or liquidated sum due from a plaintiff to a defendant which the defendant is able to set up as a defence to a claim for a debt or liquidated demand by the plaintiff against the defendant, under 2 Geo. 2, c. 22 and 8 Geo. 2, c. 24. For instance, if a plaintiff sues a defendant for a debt of £100, and the plaintiff at the same time owes £100 to the defendant, the defendant can set up this debt due to him as a defence to the action. A set-off must consist of a liquidated sum due from the plaintiff to the defendant, and can only be set up in an action for a liquidated sum of money. There can, therefore, be no set-off in actions for unliquidated damages as in actions of tort, or for breach of a contract other than a contract to pay money.

8. I assume that this question has reference to the common law jurisdiction of county courts. Under this head county courts have jurisdiction over all actions where the plaintiff does not seek to recover more than £50, except actions for malicious prosecution, defamation, seduction, breach of promise of marriage, and actions in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments shall come in question when the value of the land or hereditaments in dispute shall exceed the annual value of £20, or in the case of easements or licences when the value of the lands or hereditaments in respect of which the easement or licence is claimed, shall exceed the value of £20 per annum. And except also actions in which the validity of any devise, bequest, or limitation is in dispute. County courts have under the County Courts Act, 1867, jurisdiction in ejectment where the value of the land sought to be recovered does not exceed the annual value of £20. Any county court has jurisdiction to try any action that may be brought in any court of common law if both parties so agree in writing. The amount necessary to entitle a plaintiff suing in a superior court to costs depends on section 5 of the County Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), which enacts that "if in any action. . . in any superior court the plaintiff shall recover a sum not exceeding £20 if the action is founded on contract or £10 if founded on tort. . . he shall not be entitled to any costs of suit unless the judge certify on the record that there was sufficient reason for bringing such action in such superior court, or unless the court or a judge at chambers shall by rule or order allow such costs."

Besides their common law jurisdiction county courts have an equity jurisdiction, an admiralty jurisdiction, and also jurisdiction in many miscellaneous matters.

9. The defendants in such a case can obtain an order staying the proceedings in all the actions but one, the defendants undertaking to be bound by the verdict in such action and to pay the amount of their several subscriptions and costs if the plaintiff should recover.

10. The venue is the county stated in the margin of a declaration. Every declaration must have this statement in the margin. Its substantial use is to inform the defendant where the plaintiff proposes to try the cause.

The venue is local or transitory. It is called local when the cause must be tried (and, therefore, stated in the margin of the declaration), where the cause of action arose, as, for instance, in trespass quare clausum fregit. In these actions the plaintiff has no choice as to place where he will lay the venue. The venue is called transitory when the cause may be tried wherever the plaintiff likes, as in actions for breach of contract. In these cases the plaintiff puts any venue he likes in the margin. The Court has, however, always power to change the venue. The venue in the great majority of actions is transitory.

11. An ordinary writ of summons remains in force for six months. If it is not served within the six months it may be renewed at any time before its expiration for six months from the date of such renewal, and so from time to time during the currency of the renewed writ, by being marked with a seal by the proper officer, such seal bearing the date of such renewal. By the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 58, "A plaintiff shall be deemed out of court unless he declare within one year after the writ of summons is returnable."

12. Yes. A. can attach the debt due to B. by C. under sections 60—7 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. Under these sections A. can obtain a judge's order upon C. (there called the garnishee) requiring him to pay to A. the amount of the debt due by C. to B. If C.'s debt is larger than the judgment debt, then C. is only called upon to pay an amount equal to the judgment debt. If C. does not pay after a judge's order requiring him to do so a judge may order execution to issue against C. for the amount of the debt. If C. disputes his liability to B., A. may proceed against C. by writ calling upon C. to show cause why there should not be execution against C. for the alleged debt (s. 64).

13. The order should be made a rule of court, which may be done as of course, and then execution may be issued on such rule under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 18.

14. He should pay the £30 into court and should only defend the action as to the remaining £20. If he does so and the plaintiff accepts the money in satisfaction of the claim the plaintiff will be entitled to costs. If the plaintiff reply that the payment into court is not sufficient and goes to trial, and the defendant succeeds on this issue at the trial, the defendant will then be entitled to the costs of the action subsequent to his plea of payment into court.

15. The proceeding is called "interpleading." The person in possession can obtain a judge's order requiring the two claimants to decide the question between them and to relieve him from any liability in the matter. The application for this order cannot be made until after an action has been commenced against the person in possession by one of the claimants and after the declaration has been delivered. The application should be made before plea pleaded. The application should be made at chambers on affidavits. If the claimant does not appear an order may be made barring his claim. If the claimant persists in his claim he will be made defendant in lieu of the original defendant or an issue will be ordered or the claims disposed of in a summary manner at chambers. When a person claims from a sheriff goods seized by the sheriff in execution, the sheriff may obtain an interpleader order, although no action has been commenced against him.

II.—CONVEYANCING.

1. The £10,000 would be settled in trust—

- (1) For the husband for life, and subject thereto
- (2) For the wife for life, and subject thereto
- (3) For the children of the marriage, as husband and wife or survivor should appoint, and in default of appointment
- (4) In trust for sons who attain the age of twenty-one, and daughters who attain that age or marry; and in default of children.

(5) In trust for the husband absolutely.

The £5,000 would be settled in trust—

- (1) In the wife for her separate use without power of anticipation during her life, with remainder
- (2) To the husband for his life.

The trusts in favour of the children could be similar to those of the £10,000, but the ultimate trust in default of children would be for the wife absolutely if she should survive her husband, but if not, then as she should appoint, and in default of appointment for the persons who would have been entitled thereto if she had died possessed thereof intestate, and without having been married.

2. By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 48, s. 6, where any sale by auction of land is declared either in the particulars or conditions of sale to be subject to a right for the seller to bid, it shall be lawful for the seller, or any one person on his behalf, to bid at such auction in such manner as he may think proper.

The above Act applies only to sales of land. With regard to other cases, the rule is as laid down in Dart's Ven. & Pur. 125—6, that unless the property be expressly or impliedly offered for sale without reserve, the employment of a bidder to prevent its going at an undervalue is allowable in equity; but the rule is not so extended as to authorise the employment of more bidders than one, even although they are limited to the same sum; nor even of a single bidder for the purpose of enhancing the price indefinitely.

3. For life or lives in being, and twenty-one years afterwards, allowing an additional period for gestation, should gestation exist, and also for the minority of any person who may be entitled, for the period of twenty-one years is independent of the minority of any person concerned.

4. Yes, by the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 57 (commonly called Malins' Act), the assignment must be made by deed acknowledged, according to section 2 of that Act.

A married woman cannot, however, dispose of a reversionary interest in cases where she is forbidden to do so under the deed by which she becomes entitled thereto (section 1), nor in cases where she becomes entitled thereto under her marriage settlement (section 4).

5. Yes, by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 32, unless they are forbidden to do so by the instrument creating the trust.

6. The trustees will covenant, each for himself, that he has done nothing to prevent his exercising the powers of sale and appointment to the purchaser, or to incumber the property.

The tenant for life will covenant—

- (1) That he and the trustees have right to consent and appoint:
- (2) For quiet enjoyment:
- (3) For freedom from incumbrances:
- (4) For further assurance:

Concluding with a proviso that, as respects the reversion or remainder expectant on the life estate of the tenant for life, and the title to and further assurance of the premises after his decease, his covenants shall not extend to the acts, deeds, or defaults of any person or persons other than himself and his own heirs, and persons claiming through or in trust for him or them (Davidson, vol. 2, pp. 234—237).

7. By statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145, s. 26, in all cases where any property is held by trustees in trust for an infant, either absolutely or contingently, they may at their sole discretion pay to his guardian, or otherwise apply for his maintenance and education, the whole or any part of the income of the property, and they shall accumulate the residue of such income, by way of compound interest, for the benefit of the person who shall be ultimately entitled to the property, unless it appears to them expedient to apply such accumulations as if the same were part of the income arising in the then current year.

By section 34 this enactment extends only to persons acting under a deed and will executed after the passing of the Act (Aug. 28, 1860).

Or the executor may pay the legacy into court under statute 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 32 (see Wms. on Executors, 6th ed. pp. 1299, 1306).

8. By the grant of a power of distress to the mortgagor (see the forms in Davidson, vol. i. pp. 258—9). A mortgagee in possession is also not unfrequently required to attorn tenant to the mortgagee at a fixed rent (Davidson, vol. i. p. 273), and thus to confer on him a right to distrain so long as the actual tenancy subsists; but a power of distress (Mr. Davidson thinks) is probably a better protection to a mortgagee than an attornment (see Walker v. Giles, 6 C. B. 662; Davidson, vol. 1, pp. 258—9, n. b).

9. An easement may be defined to be a privilege without profit, which the owner of one neighbouring tenement hath of another, existing in respect of their several tenements, by which the servient owner is obliged "to suffer or not to do" something on his own land for the advantage of the dominant owner (Gale on Easements, 4th ed. p. 5).

The following are instances of easements, among many others which might be mentioned:—

- (1) A right of way.
- (2) A right of passage for water.
- (3) A right to the enjoyment of light and air.

10. The conditions of sale would include the following:—
"The tenant's fixtures upon the property shall be paid for by the purchasers at a valuation; and the decision as to what are tenant's fixtures and the valuation aforesaid shall be made by two persons, one to be named by the vendor and the other by the purchaser or by an umpire appointed by the valuers.

"The title shall commence with the lease (or underlease) under which the vendor holds."

See the conditions of sale in the case of leaseholds set out at full length in Davidson, vol. i. pp. 563—9. Most of these are identical with the conditions which would be required at a sale of freeholds.

11. Yes. With the sanction of the Court of Chancery in the following cases:—

By 11 Geo. 4, and 1 Will. 4, c. 47, s. 11, where any suit has been instituted in a court of equity for payment of debts of persons deceased to which their heirs or devisees may be subject, and the Court of Equity shall decree the estates to be sold for satisfaction of such debts, and the heir or devisee be an infant, the Court of Chancery may compel the infant heirs or devisees to convey the estates to the purchaser or purchasers thereof (see also 2 & 3 Vict. c. 60, and Wms. on Real Prop. 8th ed. p. 64).

The principal statute passed of late with reference to conveyances by infants is the Infants' Settlement Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 43, by which every infant, not under 20 if a male, and not under 17 if a female, is empowered to make a valid or binding settlement on his or her marriage, with the sanction of the Court of Chancery.

12. The provision for the eldest child should be made out of the £12,000 which the father has of his own. He could assign the money, or so much of it as he might think sufficient, to trustees, with ample discretionary powers.

13. In the case of Gambo's Trusts, 7 W. R. Ch. Dig. 101, 4 K. & J. 756, it was held that under a bequest "To the heirs of my late partner Henry Brooke, Esq., the sum of £600 for losses sustained during the time that the business of the house was under my sole control," the persons entitled ab intestato under the Statute of Distributions, and not the heir at law of Henry Brooke, were entitled.

Had the bequest been "To the heirs of my late partner" simply, Vice-Chancellor Wood said that he should not have been so clear upon the point.

It would seem, then, that if there be nothing explanatory in the context of the will, the point must be considered doubtful.

14. Springing or shifting uses are executory interests created under the Statute of Uses. Executory interests are future estates which arise independently of any prior estates which may be subsisting (Wms. on Real Prop., 8th ed., pp. 278, 279).

15. The principal incidents of copyhold tenure are as follows:—

- (1) The lord is actually seised of all the copyhold lands of his manor.
- (2) The lord has a right to mines and timber.
- (3) If a copyholder should grant a lease of his copyhold lands beyond the term of a year, without his lord's consent, such a lease would be a cause of forfeiture to the lord, unless it were authorised by a special custom of the manor.
- (4) Nor can a copyholder commit waste, either voluntary or permissive.

(Wms. on Real Prop., 8th ed., pp. 340—342.)

III.—EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By H. N. MOZLEY, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. Because the common law courts fell short in the performance of their judicial duties; and this in two ways:—

(1) The plaintiff had to determine within what class of wrong his case fell, and to select the writ appropriate to the class in question. He was then exposed to the risk of selecting an improper writ, and failing in this action on that account, though the facts were such as to bring the case of wrong within some one of the classes recognised as remediable at common law.

(2) The wrong might not fall distinctly within any of the ascertained common law classes.

Thus, those who suffered wrongs for which the common law afforded no redress, or inadequate redress, applied either to the King in Parliament or to the King in Council, who referred these matters to the Chancellor. This was the origin of equity jurisprudence.

Equity, in legal phrase, is that portion of justice which the common law courts omitted to enforce; an omission which was supplied by the Court of Chancery (Haynes on Eq., pp. 7—13).

2. The Court of Appeal in Chancery, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, or Lord Justice, or both sitting together; the courts of the three Vice-Chancellors, and of the Master of Rolls.

From the Court of Appeal in Chancery an appeal lies to the House of Lords.

From the Courts of the Vice-Chancellors and of the Master of the Rolls an appeal lies either to the Court of Appeal in Chancery or to the House of Lords.

There is also a court of equity for the county Palatine of Lancashire, from which there is an appeal to the Court of Appeal in Chancery.

The county courts also administer equity under statute 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99. An appeal lies from the county courts sitting as equity courts to one of the Vice-Chancellors.

3. There is no limit of time after which a cestui que trust, so long as he retains that relation, is barred from claiming a trust fund or arrears of dividends from his trustee (Smith's Manual of Equity, p. 139).

4. By Locke King's Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113, passed in the year 1854, the mortgaged estate is primarily liable to the payment of the mortgaged debt, unless the deceased mortgagor, by will, deed, or other document, shall have expressed an intention to the contrary. Before that Act, the general rule was, that the general personal estate of the mortgagor was primarily liable to the payment of the mortgaged debt (see Smith's Manual of Equity, pp. 262—266).

5. No, he cannot (Sm. Man. Eq. pp. 290, 291, and cases there cited).

6. The Court will not permit a man to proceed both at law and in equity at the same time in respect of the same demand, but will compel him to elect in which court he will proceed.

If, however, the proceeding at law is ancillary to that in equity, the Court may allow the action to proceed, retaining the bill in the meantime (Cons. Ord. xlii. rules 5—8; Kerr on Injunctions, 103, and cases there cited).

Election is defined in Mr. Smith's Manual of Equity, p. 350, as "the choosing between two rights by a person who derives one of them under an instrument in which a clear intention appears that he should not enjoy both."

This, however, is a different kind of election from that above alluded to, which is the choosing between two modes of procedure by a person who is not permitted to avail himself of both at the same time.

7. By the 62nd section of the Chancery Procedure Act of 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, power is given to the Court of Chancery to try legal rights between the parties to a suit in which the title to the equitable relief sought depends upon the disputed legal right. This permissive enactment has been made compulsory in a more extended form by Sir John Rolt's Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 42 (see Haynes on Eq. pp. 276—7).

Courts of equity have power to grant damages under Sir Hugh Cairns' Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, in addition to or in substitution for any relief by way of injunction or specific performance to which a plaintiff might have been entitled.

On the other hand, certain powers exercised only by the equity courts were granted to the common law courts by the Common Law Procedure Acts of 1854 and 1860.

Thus the 82nd section of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), empowers a plaintiff, at any time after action brought, and either before or after judgment, to apply for a writ of injunction against the repetition of the injury complained of.

By the 50th section, power is given to either party to apply for an order upon the opposite party to answer on affidavit what documents he has in his possession relative to the matter in dispute; and upon such affidavits being made, the Court may make such further order thereon as shall be just.

By the 51st section, power is given to either party to administer interrogatories to the opposite party.

By the 78th section, the Court in an action of detinue may order execution for the return of the chattels detained.

By sections 83—86, power is given to a defendant at law who has a defence in equity, to set up his equitable defence by way of plea.

(See further, on this point, Haynes on Equity, pp. 169, 170, 288—290).

8. By the common law, a wife's personal property became the husband's absolutely, subject only to the necessity of a reduction into possession during the lifetime of the husband.

Courts of equity allow a married woman, through the medium of trustees, to enjoy property to her separate use independently of her husband, and that with or without the power of anticipating the income of the property so settled.

A married woman may, in equity, be sued with reference to her separate property; and a bond by a married woman having property settled to her separate use without restraint on anticipation is held to bind that property.

A married woman is also capable in the contemplation of a court of equity of committing a fraud, and is liable to be visited, as regards her equitable property, with the consequences of that fraud (Re Lush's Trusts, 17 W. R. 974).

Courts of equity may order specific performance of contracts in cases where courts of law can only give damages for the breach thereof. Courts of law cannot, under the name of mandamus, enforce the specific performance of a personal contract, notwithstanding the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), s. 68. See Benson v. Paull, 4 W. R. 493, 2 Jur. N. S. 425; Haynes' Outlines of Equity, p. 290.

Courts of equity had power to compel a defendant to give discovery at a time when the evidence of interested parties was excluded from the courts of common law. The powers of the common law courts under this head are now considerably enlarged: see answer to question 7.

9. When it is clear that the courts of law could always afford adequate relief, without the aid of courts of equity, and without circuity of action or multiplicity of suits, and could take care of the rights of all who are interested in the property in controversy, equity has no jurisdiction. Nor has it jurisdiction as to those rights which could not be practically enforced without occasioning a greater general mischief or inconvenience than that which results from leaving them to be disposed of in foro conscientie.

OBITUARY.

MR. S. LAING, JUN.

Mr. Samuel Laing, jun., barrister-at-law, died suddenly on the 27th May, in a committee-room at Westminster-hall, where he was engaged on Parliamentary business. He was the eldest son of Mr. Samuel Laing, chairman of the London and Brighton Railway Company, and formerly Finance Minister for India, sometime M.P. for the Wick Burghs. Mr. S. Laing, jun., who was in his twenty-seventh year, was educated at Harrow, and afterwards graduated at Cambridge. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in November, 1866, and had already acquired considerable practice. Mr. Laing was a member of the Home Circuit, and leaves a widow, to whom he was recently married.

MR. JOHN LINKLATER.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. John Linklater, the head of the firm of J. & H. Linklater, Hackwood, & Addison, who died on the 27th ult. at the age of fifty-three years. Mr. Linklater had for some months past been in weak health, and had passed the winters of the last and the preceding year in the South of France. His friends, however, entertained the hope that his health had been at least partially restored, and were looking forward to his speedy return to England, for which indeed he had made preparations, when an attack of acute bronchitis ended fatally. He had just moved from Hyères to Toulon on his road homewards. Mr. Linklater's great exertions throughout his professional career in many heavy and arduous legal matters, his extraordinary energy, and his power of dealing with the most complicated and intricate details, especially in matters of account which he seemed to comprehend almost intuitively, are known to all; whilst few who were acquainted with him will forget the remarkable personal influences which he exercised over those around him. As a lawyer Mr. Linklater was possessed of large and varied learning. He was, moreover, an advocate of great power, and in the other branch of the profession would have risen to high honours. His death leaves a blank most difficult to fill, and will be widely and deeply felt.

Mr. Linklater was admitted in the year 1838. He leaves a widow and four children.

MR. J. H. BOYS.

Mr. John Harvey Boys, solicitor, died at Margate on the 29th May, in his fifty-fifth year. He was certificated in 1837, and was formerly professional assistant to the solicitor of customs, excise, and stamps for the Isle of Thanet; he was also clerk to the magistrates, and joint registrar to the Commissioners of Salvage. At the latter end of last year, he was appointed first coroner of Margate, which office he resigned a few weeks ago, when his son, Mr. Athelstan Harvey Boys, was appointed to succeed him. The late Mr. Boys was a member of the Incorporated Law Society, and a commissioner for oaths and affidavits.

MR. J. LAY.

Mr. James Lay, solicitor, of London and Colchester, died at his residence in Addington-square, Camberwell, on the 16th May, at the age of fifty-seven years. He was certificated in Hilary Term, 1861, and carried on business in the Poultry, and at Colchester.

MR. G. E. FERNS.

Mr. George Egerton Ferns, solicitor, of Stockport, died on the 18th May, at the age of twenty-nine years. He was certificated in Hilary Term, 1863, and was a member of the Solicitors Benevolent Association.

THE LEGAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

The Legal Education Association has been formed with the following objects:—

1st. The establishment of a law university for the education of students intended for the profession of the law.

2nd. The placing of the admission to both branches of the profession on the basis of a combined test of collegiate education and examination by a public board of examiners.

It is proposed, by the establishment of a law university in London, to promote a more scientific and systematic study of the law than at present exists in England. Many of the defects in our law, much of the confusion and perplexity which pervade our legislation, may be fairly attributed to the want of such an institution, and to the absence of that scientific study and training which a well constituted law school would afford. The establishment of an efficient law school would therefore be the best preparation for a reform of the law itself. England, it is believed, is the only first-class State in Europe where a systematic study of the law does not exist, and the profession of the law is the only profession in England which exists in a state of almost complete isolation from all that has been done in late years for the science to which it relates on the continent of Europe. The reason of this state of things is, that in England all the lawyers are practitioners, and there is no school of law, and therefore no science of law, and no established system of teaching.

The establishment of a law university would also be of great advantage to the public in a practical point of view.

The qualification to practise the profession of the law in both its branches being consequent upon collegiate education at the proposed university, combined with the test of examination by a public and independent board, will afford the public the best guarantee that those who practise as barristers, attorneys, or solicitors, or who are legally qualified for appointments to which barristers and attorneys and solicitors alone are eligible, are men of some capacity and education, and that they have acquired some knowledge of law. At present anyone may become a barrister and obtain the right to practise, and the qualification for appointments to which barristers are eligible, without submitting himself to any examination or other satisfactory test of fitness whatever. In no other country but our own is this the case.

The project of a law university is not new. All that is now proposed is to carry out more fully the recommendation made by the Royal Commission appointed in 1855 "to inquire into the arrangements of the Inns of Court and Inns of Chancery," and to enlarge the scope of that recommendation by bringing within it both branches of the profession. The present Lord Chancellor, the present Lord Chief Justice of England, Lord Westbury, Mr. Justice Keating, Sir John Taylor Coleridge, Sir Joseph Napier, and Sir John Shaw Lefevre, were members of that commission. The report of the commissioners is confined to education for the bar, and the general tenor of it will appear from the following extracts:—

"As regards the duty which the Inns of Court owe to the community, whilst conferring on individuals the right of practising at the bar, it will be proper to call attention to the privileges incident to the status of a barrister. He alone is allowed to plead for others in the superior courts of Westminster, and he is not responsible to his clients for negligence or otherwise. He alone is eligible for numerous appointments of considerable emolument and responsibility in this country, including not only the higher judicial appointments but also the offices of recorder, judge of a county court, or commissioner of bankruptcy, and revising barrister. The police magistrates of the metropolis also are now selected from the bar. In the colonies the judicial appointments open to barristers only are also numerous.

"The Inns of Court being entrusted with the exclusive right of conferring or withholding a position to which such privileges as we have enumerated are incident, the community is surely entitled to require some guarantee—first, for the personal character, and next for the professional qualifications of the individuals called to the bar. The only security at present possessed by those who employ a barrister as counsel consists in this, that any defect in the advocate may lead to the loss of practice. But there is not even such security against the appointment of an unfit person to any of the judicial offices to which we have referred."

After speaking of the attention directed by the Inns of Court to the moral character of candidates for admission to the bar, the report continues as follows:—

"We have hitherto considered the question of the education of a barrister on general principles, and on those grounds alone have come to the conclusion that there ought to be a test both of the general and the professional knowledge of every candidate for the bar.

"But we are fortified in this conclusion when we look to the course adopted by the other learned professions, as well as in the subordinate branch of the law.

"The clergyman, the physician, the surgeon, the apothecary, as well as the attorney or solicitor, are all required to pass an examination before they are permitted to practise. In the navy and army, a like examination of officers is required before they are entitled to their first commission, and also before a lieutenancy in the one or a captaincy in the other is attained. In every other country in Europe an educational test is applied to advocates either by requiring a degree in law at a university, or else by a distinct professional examination. In Scotland, the Faculty of Advocates have so recently as in the last year required a test both of general and professional knowledge.

"In arriving at this conclusion, with respect to the necessity of a test, we desire to be understood as not disparaging or undervaluing the present system of practical study in a barrister's chambers, which must be admitted to be very efficient in fitting the student for the active duties of his profession; it affords, however, no facilities for the study of the scientific branches of legal knowledge, including under that term—constitutional law and legal history, and civil law and jurisprudence."

"The most convenient method of acquiring knowledge of these subjects is by lectures, followed by examination applicable both to the lectures and to the subjects generally."

The commissioners then proceed to consider the best mode of carrying such a system of instruction as they conceived to be necessary into effect, and make the following recommendations:—

"We think that considerable advantage would result to the bar as a liberal profession from a better recognised and more definite and permanent combination of the Inns of Court in reference to legal education and examinations than exists at present in respect of the Council of Legal Education, and that the inns might be united in a university, still preserving their independence respectively as distinct societies with respect to their property and internal arrangements.

"Such a university might not only regulate the examinations to which we have adverted, but might likewise confer degrees in law."

"From the foregoing considerations, we deem it advisable that there shall be established a preliminary examination for admission to the Inns of Court of persons who have not taken a university degree, and that there shall be examinations, the passing of which shall be requisite for the call to the bar; and that the four Inns of Court shall be united in one university for the purpose of these examinations, and of conferring degrees."

The report then gives the heads of a scheme for establishing the proposed university.

The recommendations contained in the report of the Royal Commission have been to some extent carried out. The four Inns of Court now elect a Council of Legal Education to superintend the education for the bar. The council appoint six readers or lecturers, by whom lectures are delivered, and examinations are held twice a year, at which studentships, exhibitions, and certificates of honour are awarded. But it is not obligatory on any student to attend the lectures or pass the examinations, and the precarious or temporary character of the arrangement is indicated by the appointment of the readers being only for three years. Notwithstanding these improvements, any person may now qualify for admission to the bar by passing, previous to his admission to an inn of court, an examination in the English language, the Latin language, and English history, by dining in the hall of the inn of court to which he is admitted a fixed number of times during twelve terms, and by becoming a pupil for one year in the chambers of a barrister or pleader; there being no mode appointed for ascertaining whether the pupillage has been more than nominal, or whether the student has acquired thereby any knowledge of his profession. There is no other necessary test of learning or competency now required previous to a call to the bar.

The superintendence of the education of attorneys and solicitors is entrusted by law to the judges of the courts of common law and the Master of the Rolls, who have to satisfy themselves of the fitness and capacity of all persons applying to be admitted as attorneys and solicitors. This duty is performed by appointing every year sixteen attorneys or solicitors (generally chosen from the Council of the Incorporated Law Society), who, with the masters of the common law courts, act as examiners of all candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors. The Council of the Incorporated Law Society appoint annually three lecturers, by whom lectures are delivered to articulated clerks. The attendance at the lectures is voluntary, but no one can be admitted an attorney or solicitor without passing two examinations; one during, and the other at the close of, his clerkship. It will be seen, therefore, that in the case of attorneys and solicitors, although the examinations previous to admission are compulsory, yet the means for obtaining a systematic training and scientific education are extremely scanty and imperfect. If a compulsory examination be desirable for attorneys and solicitors, it seems equally or more necessary in that branch of the profession, from which all the judges at home and in the colonies, the stipendiary magistrates, and numerous other judicial and quasi-judicial officers are selected, for whose fitness and capacity there is at present no guarantee, unless they happen to have attained success in the practice of their profession; a test that may afford a fair guide in filling the higher offices, but cannot be practically applied to the numerous candidates for the minor judicial appointments at home and abroad.

Much importance is attached by the association to the establishment of a system of common education for both branches of the profession, those who aspire to the higher branch being required to undergo a longer course of training and a severer test of knowledge than those who desire to practise only as attorneys or solicitors. It is believed that such a common education would greatly improve the relations at present existing between barristers and attorneys and solicitors, and bring about more frequently than at present a common action by both branches of the profession, for the amendment of the law, and for the promotion of other public objects.

It would appear from the foregoing statement that all the materials for the proposed Law University are already in existence and at hand, and only require to be judiciously combined and incorporated. In the Inns of Court, their Council of Legal Education, and their six readers, on the one hand, and the Incorporated Law Society and their three lecturers, coupled with the Provincial Law Societies on the other, we seem to have most of the elements already in operation which require only to be brought together and united as a whole in order to form the basis of the proposed university. It is also believed that the students annually entering the two branches of the profession are sufficiently numerous to make such a university at once self-supporting. It is only by means of the establishment of some such law college or university as is here proposed, and the succession of teachers and writers which it would ensure, that we can hope to see arise a school of British jurisprudence worthy to be placed side by side with the great schools of France and Germany.

It is considered that it might be most expedient to entrust the government of the University to a Senate, elected by the Inns of Court, the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge and London, the Incorporated Law Society, and some of the Provincial Law Societies, together with some ex officio members, and other members nominated by the Crown. But the association is not pledged to any details of such a measure, or to anything beyond the two objects at the head of this circular.

The Lord Chancellor and the following judges have already expressed their general approval of the above proposals:—

The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron, Lord Penzance, the Vice-Chancellor Malins, the Vice-Chancellor James, Mr. Baron Martin, Mr. Baron Bramwell, Mr. Baron Channell, Mr. Justice Montague Smith, Mr. Justice Hannen, and the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

The association has also received from other distinguished lawyers assurances of hearty approval and co-operation; and the committee believe that they have only to make known the objects which they have in view in order to obtain the approval and support of all who take an interest in the progress of the profession and in the advancement of a scientific study of the law in England.

The association, therefore, confidently appeals to both branches of the profession and to the general public for support.

Those who wish to become members of the association are requested to communicate with the Honorary Secretaries: Arthur J. Williams, 4, Harcourt-buildings, Temple; William A. Jevons, 12, Castle-street, Liverpool; or Frank R. Parker, 41, Bedford-row, W.C., from whom any further information may be obtained.

COURT PAPERS.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

The Judicial Committee will commence sitting for the despatch of business on Friday, the 17th June, 1870, at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

SUMMER CIRCUIT.

HOME.—Lord Chief Justice Bovill and Mr. Justice Blackburn.

MIDLAND.—Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Justice Brett.

WESTERN.—Mr. Baron Martin and Mr. Justice Willes.

NORFOLK.—Mr. Baron Channell and Mr. Justice Keating.

OXFORD.—Mr. Justice Mellor and Mr. Baron Pigott.

NORTHERN.—Mr. Justice Lush and Mr. Baron Cleasby.

NORTH WALES.—The Lord Chief Justice of England.

SOUTH WALES.—Mr. Justice Hannen.

Mr. Justice Montague Smith remains in town.

The Countess Teleki, only child of the late Lord Langdale, Master of the Rolls, died at Damascus on the 3rd of May. Lady Langdale was with her daughter at her demise.

Mr. R. R. Dees, solicitor, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, has purchased the estate of Morris Hall, near that town, for the sum of £29,000.

On Thursday last Mr. W. H. Cotterill, solicitor, of Throgmorton-street, was adjudicated a bankrupt by Mr. Registrar Roche. Mr. J. H. Linklater appeared for the petitioning creditor.

On Sunday afternoon last, being the first Sunday in Trinity Term, a representative portion of the Common Law Judges attended service at St. Paul's Cathedral, with the Corporation, according to custom. On Tuesday the Lord Mayor entertained the judges at the customary banquet at the Mansion House.

A San Francisco judge lately tempered justice with mercy by fining a half-starved girl twenty-five cents for stealing a pitcher of milk, and then raising twenty dollars for her among the lawyers and others who were in court.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds have established a further improvement this week though the movement has not been continuous. The railway market has also, on the whole, been particularly buoyant, and although in the middle of the week a sharp decline followed a rise in prices, being occasioned by the realisations of speculators, the result of the week exhibits on the average a considerable advance. Foreign securities also are active, with the exception of Americans. The Board of Trade returns are thought to indicate that the much wished-for revival has come at last. The new Japanese Loan, which, after having been eagerly subscribed for, fell to five per cent. discount, has risen nearly to par.

The Directors of the Devon and Somerset Railway, which by agreement, confirmed by Act of Parliament, is to be worked in perpetuity by the Bristol and Exeter Railway, are prepared to receive applications for £255,000 (balance unissued of £270,000) first mortgage A debenture stock, bearing 6 per cent for an interest, which is issued in pursuance of the Railway Companies Act, 1867. The price of issue of the stock now offered is par, or £100 for each £100 stock; it will be issued in any amount not being less than £100 stock, payable by instalments, the last being on February 15, 1871. Interest will accrue from the dates of payment of each instalment, but subscribers will have the option of paying the whole of the instalments on allotment, in which case interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum will also be allowed on such payments. The interest will be payable half-yearly, on 1st January and 1st July in each year, at the National Provincial Bank of England, London.

Messrs. J. H. Schroder & Co. offer £11,920,000 nominal capital Six per cent. Consolidated Bonds of the Government of Peru for the construction of railroads—from Callao to La Oroya, £5,520,000, and from Arequipa to Puno, £6,400,000—total £11,920,000. 1. The bonds will be in amounts of £1,000, £500, £200, £100, £50 and £20, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable by coupons half-yearly on the 1st January and 1st July in each year (the first being payable on the 1st January next). The coupons will be payable in London in sterling; in Paris, at the exchange of twenty-five francs per pound sterling; and in Amsterdam at the exchange of the day on London. 2. The redemption will be effected by half-yearly drawings at par, commencing on the 1st April, 1880, by the operation of a Sinking Fund of two per cent. per annum of the entire capital, plus the interest on the redeemed bonds, so that the entire amount will be paid off at the end of twenty-five years from that date. The bonds so drawn will be paid off three months after the date of drawing. Applications will be received by Messrs. J. Henry Schroder & Co., 145, Leadenhall-street, on the 7th and 8th June; and applications from the country until noon on Thursday the 9th June.

CITY-ROAD.—A valuable and important Estate, advantageously situate close to Finsbury-square, with frontage to the City-road and two side streets, offering great capabilities for the erection of an extensive range of warehouses or manufacturing premises; held for a long term at a ground-rent. Vendor's Solicitor, W. WEALL, Esq., Doctors'-commons.

BRIXTON.—Two excellent long Leasehold semi-detached Villa Residences, situate and being Nos. 3 and 4, Overton-road, Angell-park. Rental value £120 per annum. Long term at low ground rents. Vendor's Solicitors, Messrs. HARRISON, BEAL, & HARRISON, 19, Bedford-row, W.C.

UPPER NORWOOD.—Valuable and charming Freehold Estate, comprising a handsome family residence, built in the Italian villa style, and distinguished as Beaumont, situate at Upper Norwood, about a mile from the Norwood Junction Railway Station and the Crystal Palace, and commanding an uninterrupted view, extending over Richmond, Wimbledon, Epsom Downs, and to Windsor Castle; containing nine bed chambers, bath room, three reception rooms, and conservatory, and superior domestic accommodation; stabling for four horses, coachhouse, &c., pleasure ground, vinery, paddocks, &c., in all about five and a quarter acres. With possession. Vendor's Solicitors, Messrs. BOOTH & BURT, 1, Raymonds'-buildings, Gray's-inn, W.C.

No. 24, Gresham-street, Bank, E.C.

In the counties of Somerset and Dorset.—Important and valuable estate of 554 acres, with a capital mansion-house, several capital residences, farm-houses, cottages, and buildings, situate adjoining the South Western Railway, close to the Crewkerne Station.

MESSRS. WAINWRIGHTS & HEARD beg to announce that they are instructed to submit to public competition, at the GEORGE HOTEL, CREWKERNE, on TUESDAY, JUNE 21, 1870, at TWO for THREE o'clock in the afternoon, a very valuable and highly important RESIDENTIAL ESTATE, upwards of 554 acres in extent, partly freehold and partly held for long terms of years absolute, desirably situate in the parishes of Misterton and Crewkerne, in the county of Somerset, and Mosterton, in the county of Dorset, comprising an excellent family mansion, known as "Misterton House," with lawn, pleasure grounds, gardens, conservatory, stabling, and offices, replete with every convenience. An attractive and most convenient residence, called the Lodge, with suitable offices placed in park-like grounds near Misterton church, with excellent walled gardens. A comfortable residence and garden in Misterton, adjoining the turnpike-road. The OLD MANOR FARM-HOUSE, with suitable homestead and buildings, several good cottages, and the smith's shop in the village. Another good FARM-HOUSE and BUILDINGS at Bluntmoor, and sundry closes of rich meadow and pasture, very fertile arable, and luxuriant orchard land, principally arranged in three suitable farms; the whole farmed by the proprietor, and in the highest and most perfect state of cultivation. The property is studded with plantations and underwoods, forming excellent preserves for game. The whole is abundantly supplied with water, and very superior building and limestone can be quarried on several portions of the estate. Many of the lands abut on the turnpike-road, close to the railway station, and are admirably situated for building sites, being within one mile of the town of Crewkerne, and commanding extensive and beautiful views over a rich and picturesque country. The estate will be first offered in one lot, and if not sold, then in 26 lots, as described in particulars, or in such other lots as may be determined at the time of sale.

The property may be viewed by application to Mr. John Warren, the bailiff, at the Manor House, Misterton; and printed particulars and plans may be obtained at the said Manor House; the place of sale; the George Inn, Chard; the Cloughs, Yeovil; at the offices of WAINWRIGHTS & HEARD, Surveyors, Shepton Mallet; or at the offices of Mr. BATTEN, Solicitor, Yeovil.

LONDON, JUNE 11, 1870.

ON THURSDAY THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS decided in favour of the petitioners the special case arising out of the Bristol Election. This result probably was not very generally anticipated, as the real nature of the point reserved was not generally known, and even now the decision seems much misunderstood by our contemporaries. The decision of the Court proceeded on the ground pointed out by us last week, that each person who voted for Mr. Robinson at the test-ballot did endeavour to procure his return. It was, therefore, bribery to give money to persons to induce them so to vote. It was stated by Baron Bramwell, as a fact, that at the time when the test-ballot was held there was a well-founded belief that the candidate who then obtained the majority would ultimately be returned.

This being so, it followed, almost as of course, that a vote for a candidate at the test-ballot was an endeavour to procure his ultimate return. It is needless to say that the decision, though unexpected, was in our opinion quite right, and moreover will be a beneficial one.

WE PRINT IN ANOTHER PART of this week's number two new series of rules just issued for use in the county courts, one relating to proceedings under the Debtors Act, 1869, the other to ordinary common law and equitable proceedings. The new Debtors Act rules are very short, but of considerable importance. Rule 2 of the rules originally issued in January last directed that a judgment-summons should not be issued by a court within the district of which the judgment-debtor did not reside except with leave of the Court. This rule was general in its terms; and it was pretty clear that the framers of the rule had not present to their minds section 8 of the County Court Act, 1867, by which, if an action is commenced in a metropolitan court, all subsequent proceedings in the action are to be taken in the same court if the party against whom they are taken resides or carries on business within the district of any of the metropolitan county courts. Hence, as far as the metropolitan courts were concerned, the Act and the rule were inconsistent. Rule 3 of the rules just issued gets rid of this difficulty by saying that for the purpose of judgment-summonses the districts of the metropolitan courts shall be deemed one district.

Rule 4 makes a change of great utility, though one which we should be greatly inclined to say was quite ultra vires were it not that there is a strong precedent in its favour. Section 5 of the Debtors Act gives power to commit for "any debt due in pursuance of any order or judgment." The Rule Committee in framing their original rules appear to have construed these words strictly, and to have held that though they included the amount of a judgment with costs up to judgment, they could not include any costs subsequent to judgment, such as costs of an unsuccessful execution. But the Court of Chancery, in its orders under the same Act, having in the meantime taken a more liberal view of the construction of the section, the Rule Committee have now provided that "all costs incurred by the plaintiff in endeavouring to enforce an order or judgment shall be deemed to be due in pursuance of such order or judgment," and they have altered the forms in use accordingly.

The remaining new rules are framed with the view of defining more clearly than was formerly done the mode of procuring, in the case of a debtor against whom a judgment-summons has been issued, and who wishes to raise a defence under the Bankruptcy Act.

Of the new rules issued with respect to common law and equitable proceedings, the most important are those upon the following subjects. Rule 3 enables a person entitled to money which has been paid into a county court other than that within the district of which he resides or carries on business, to have the amount remitted to him by post-office order. The new rule, however, does not include the not uncommon case of money being paid in to the credit of a defendant, as, of course, a defendant has no plaint note to send. The rule would have been complete if after the words plaint note there had been inserted "or the summons if the applicant be defendant." Rule 4 enables any person about to commence proceedings in a court within the district of which he does not reside to do so by sending the necessary particulars to the registrar by post. We hardly see why the metropolitan districts should be excepted from this alteration. Rule 5 makes the districts of the metropolitan courts one district only for the purpose of rules 3 and 4. The effect of which will be that a person residing, say at the N.W. extremity of the Marylebone district, and having money paid to his credit at White-chapel, will have to travel some dozen miles to get it, unless the registrar chooses, at his own risk, to send the money by post. Generally speaking registrars are courteous enough to issue summonses by post now, if something like this rule 4 is complied with by applicants, but in London suitors will be deprived of that convenience if registrars act strictly on rule 5 in the matter. There is certainly a far greater interchange of business in the metropolitan districts than anywhere else, to the great advantage of the public, and why that interchange should be restricted in the manner intended it is hard to imagine. As to payments a better rule would be to fix a limit of say two miles from a court, beyond which money might be sent to the court or received by claimants through the post; the transmission of course being at the expense and risk of the interested parties. Rule 13 provides that, in proceedings for the recovery of small tenements, and in actions of replevin, costs may for the future be allowed upon the higher county court scale, that is to say, the scale applicable to actions of contract where more than £20 is claimed. Rule 14 corrects an awkward inaccuracy of expression occurring in the scale of costs issued in 1868. That scale provided for costs according to the higher standard in the case of "actions of debt on contract exceeding £20," and in the case of "actions of tort where damages recovered exceed £20." But it did not in terms apply to actions of tort in which more than £20 damages were claimed, but less than that sum recovered, or a verdict found for the defendant. The new rule applies the higher scale, both for the benefit of plaintiff and of defendant, to actions of tort in which more than £20 is claimed, though less may be recovered, or the judgment may be for the defendant.

THE IMPERIAL COURT OF AIX has just pronounced a decision which is of considerable importance to English merchants and shipowners.

The litigation arose under the following circumstances. On the 30th of December last a collision took place near Gibraltar between the steamer Thetis and the ship Sardis, both sailing under the English flag. Thereupon the agents of the freighters and captain of the Sardis sued the captain and freighters of the Thetis before the Tribunal of Commerce at Marseilles, seeking to recover on behalf of the owners of the Sardis the sum of 498,500 francs, which was the amount insured on the vessel, 125,000 francs, the extra value of the vessel not covered by the insurance, and for the value of the cargo, a sum to be ultimately settled by an account. The action was taken up by the underwriters of the Sardis, French subjects, to whom a notice of abandonment of the Sardis had been given. The defendants demurred to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal of Marseilles on account of their English nationality and domicile. There could have been no doubt of their being entitled to do so, according to the law of France, had the underwriters not intervened; but the latter were French subjects, and by article 14 of the Code Napoleon "an alien, though not residing in France, may be cited before the French tribunals for the obligations contracted with French subjects in a foreign country." This article, though framed apparently with reference only to obligations ex contractu, has been held to apply to all rights whatsoever claimable in a court of law, and to extend even to civil actions ex delicto and quasi ex delicto. The underwriters took advantage of this article to resist the demurrer of the defendants. The defendants, in support of their demurrer, relied on a distinction between actions arising out of rights which at the very outset had belonged to French subjects and actions springing from rights which originally existed in favour of aliens but had been subsequently transferred to French subjects. They contended that, the action having been instituted originally by English subjects, and the French underwriters being entitled to the benefit of it only through the subsequent abandonment, they stepped into the shoes of the original plaintiffs, and could have none but the rights which pertained to the latter. This distinction between rights which have been French ab ovo and rights which have only acquired, as it were, a French domicile by being shifted to a French subject, is no novelty in French jurisprudence. It originated with respect to such rights as cannot be transferred without a regular assignment. Upon these all were very soon agreed. A French subject entitled under an assignment from an alien, could not any more than that alien claim the benefit of article 14 of the Code Napoleon, and bring his action against a non-domiciled foreigner before the French Courts. Afterwards the question was raised as to bills of exchange and other negotiable instruments. When instruments were drawn to order or to bearer, the present holder being for most purposes considered as if he had received them direct from the drawer, it became a settled rule that where the debtor was an alien he might be sued by a French holder before the French Courts. The Court of Cassation, indeed, has gone so far as to decide that the same rule obtained even where the instrument had been dishonoured and endorsed over to the French holder after date. That decision, however, has been questioned and much criticised. In the present case there was no negotiable instrument; and the demurrer of the defendants to the jurisdiction of the French Courts seemed as fully operative against the French underwriters as against the owners of the English vessel which had suffered in the collision. But the underwriters bethought themselves of a way by which to take their case out of the ordinary rule. They contended that the abandonment of the vessel by the owners to the insurers had a retroactive effect, and that by the operation thereof they were to be considered as having been the owners of the vessel at the time of the collision, and therefore to be in court, not as the representatives of the English owners, but in their own right as French plaintiffs, entitled to claim the benefit of article 14 of the Code Napoleon. This view the Tribunal of Commerce of Marseilles adopted, and held that the demurrer of the defendants was not tenable. They appealed, however, to the Imperial Court of Aix, within whose jurisdiction Marseilles is situate. The Appeal Court quashed the decision of the Court below, on the ground that the abandonment had no retroactive effect, and that article 385 of the Code of Commerce plainly defines the title of the insurers to become proprietors of the property insured, as dating from the acceptance or validation of the abandonment.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE 31st section of the 80 & 81 Vict. c. 142, has been lately the subject of comment in the Court of Exchequer, and it was pointed out that the section apparently fails to effect one of the objects which the framers of the Act had in view. We refer more particularly to these words of the section, "Upon the issue of the summons any action which shall have been brought in any court . . . shall be stayed." The attention of the Court was drawn to the point in a case of Ward v. Jackson. The plaintiff in that action was the holder of a bill of sale duly registered on the goods of a certain person to whom the defendant stood in the relation of a county court execution creditor. The high bailiff having seized and sold the goods on behalf of the defendant, and the plaintiff having, under her bill of sale, laid claim to them, an interpleader issue was directed to be tried, to determine their rival claims. This issue terminated in favour of the plaintiff, who recovered, net only the costs of the issue, but also the proceeds of the execution sale, which had been paid into court, but the county court judge having exclusively confined the question before him to the ownership of the goods, the present action, of which the declaration was in trespass and trover, was subsequently brought to recover damages alleged to have been consequent on the trespass to and sale of the plaintiff's goods. On the argument of a rule which had been obtained to stay the action, it was contended on behalf of the defendant that the effect of the order made by the judge at the trial of the interpleader issue was to stay the present action, and that the Court by now disallowing the continuance of it would only effect the obvious intention of the Legislature, which meant in enacting the section to make the county court a court which should be practically one of last resort for litigants of narrow means and for the decision of questions involving only trifling sums of money. For the plaintiff it was urged that the summons which had issued in the interpleader was entirely confined to the question of the ownership of the goods seized by the high bailiff and claimed by the plaintiff and defendant, and that the interpleader was intended for the protection of that officer and not for the determination of any questions which might arise between rival claimants. The Court, in giving judgment, said that the words of the section "shall have been brought" clearly referred only to actions commenced before the issue of the summons in the interpleader issue, and, therefore, that the present action could not be stayed under them; but at the same time it expressed a very certain belief that the intention of the Legislature had been to stop actions like the present which, from the circumstances surrounding them, formed proper subjects for county court jurisdiction, and further expressed regret that the language of the section had failed to carry this into effect. Under these circumstances, the Court, being unable to stay the action and to give entire relief to the defendant, granted him a rule to add an additional plea. We imagine that no plea will be of much avail to him against the plain words of the section, and that nothing short of legislative interference can cure the evident defect under which the section in this respect labours. To effect the benefit which the section is meant to confer and to check expensive litigation for trifling ends all that is wanted is the interpolation of three words "or shall be" after the words "shall have been."

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL has brought in a bill to effect an object, of the propriety of which there can be no doubt—viz., to amend the law relating to the extradition of criminals. The bill ought to have been brought in last session, but was postponed to more important measures. We expressed a hope at the time this was announced that the bill would be laid before Parliament at any early period this session (13 S. J. 807), instead of which the Whitsuntide recess is at an end, and yet the bill has not been read a second time. The bill proposes to make but two great alterations in our municipal law relating to extradition. The first is that it ratifies by anticipation all extradition treaties which the Government of the day may henceforth enter into. Secondly, the list of crimes to which extradition treaties may hereafter extend is much enlarged, and comprehends counterfeiting coin, embezzlement and larceny, obtaining goods or money by false pretences, crimes against the bankrupt laws, robbery, sending threatening letters, burglary, and frauds by a banker, factor, trustee, or director or public officer of any company made criminal by any existing law. Of course we cannot insist that every State with whom we may enter into a treaty shall adopt this list in its integrity, but we may hope that they will be induced to do so. When an extradition treaty is entered into the Act is to be applied thereto by Order in Council with "such conditions, exceptions, and qualifications as may be deemed expedient," and the order is to be gazetted, and to lie on the tables of both Houses of Parliament. One restriction is that the treaty must be determinable by a year's notice.

There are, of course, sufficient provisions in the Act to prevent the surrender of political offenders, and also to effect that a surrendered criminal shall not be tried for any but the extradition crime until he has been restored or has had an opportunity of returning to her Majesty's dominions.

The safeguards of political refugees under the bill are three-fold. First, no warrant is to be issued under the Act except by order of a Secretary of State. The Secretary of State may refuse his order if he is of opinion that the offence is of a political character, and may also, under similar circumstances, order the discharge of any offender who is a person preparatory to extradition. Secondly, the magistrate before whom he is brought may receive evidence to show that the crime is not an extradition one, or is a political offence, and upon proof thereof must discharge the offender. Thirdly, when, from a prima facie case being made out against an offender, he is committed to prison to await his extradition, he is not to be surrendered for fifteen days, during which time he may apply for a writ of habeas corpus.

To the principles of the bill we give a general approval, and trust that nothing will prevent its becoming law this session.

THE LIST OF MARKS for the second periodical examination of the candidates selected for the Indian Civil Service in 1869 has just been issued. The Commissioners state that when less than half the minimum marks are obtained the knowledge shown is "not satisfactory." In spite of this intimation and the easiness of the papers eleven candidates have failed to obtain half marks in Jurisprudence, and no less than twenty-one—nearly half the whole number—in Indian law. This is a fair specimen of the value of the legal training future Indian judges obtain under the present system. No wonder complaints of the maladministration of justice in that country are so frequent.

THE COMPLAINT made against the Metropolitan police by Mr. Mathieu demands a passing notice in our columns. Mr. Mathieu says that he was standing peaceably one Saturday afternoon in a crowd which had been attracted near the Horse Guards by some military evolutions, when he was suddenly arrested and marched off, first to the King-street police-station close by, and afterwards thence to Bow-street.

The only act of which he was conscious, which could give rise to suspicion against him, was his having "made rather an abrupt movement of his right hand along his trousers." After being detained at Bow-street some time, he was informed that it would not be possible to have his case brought before any magistrate that day. (The way seems to have been blocked by the miserable cause celebre of the period). Finding that forty-eight hours' detention was to be his lot, the prisoner requested to be allowed to communicate with his family, but this he says was refused him, nor was he allowed to send for provisions. The police, however, seem to have visited his house in the meantime, for on the Sunday, about one p.m., Mrs. Mathieu arrived with some provisions. On the Monday morning the case was brought before the sitting magistrate when, of course, Mr. Mathieu was discharged as an innocent man.

The arrest was unfortunate, but we do not, upon the above facts, see that there is any ground for complaint against the police on that account. The "abrupt movement" of the hand which Mr. Mathieu remembered to have made no doubt resembled strongly the action of a thief trying a pocket, and the policemen were deceived by it. The police have a difficult task to discharge in crowds, and we may leave them to judge what circumstances of suspicion justify an arrest. It is quite possible for anyone to imitate unconsciously the actions of a pick-pocket, just as uninitiated persons have, we believe, been known to make Freemasons' signs without being aware of anything of the kind. So far as this goes, the police seem to have done no more than their duty.

As to the other ground of complaint; the length of this unfortunate man's detention seems to have been attributable simply to his having had the misfortune to do the innocent but suspicious act on a Saturday. If brought before the magistrate at once he would probably have been remanded for inquiries. But there is no excuse whatever for the refusal to send a messenger to the prisoner's family; and in that respect the conduct of the police at Bow-street was (if Mr. Mathieu's account is correct, and the contrary has not been shown) particularly improper.

THE ATTENTION OF CONVEYANCING LAWYERS has been aroused by the fact, that in a case of Freeman v. Pope, heard last Tuesday on appeal from the decision of Vice-Chancellor James (18 W. R. 399), both Lord Hatherley and Lord Justice Giffard express an opinion that the dictum of Lord Westbury, delivered in the leading case of Spirett v. Willoms (13 W. R. 329) was couched in too broad terms. Lord Westbury had said.—"If the debt of the creditor by whom the voluntary settlement is impeached existed at the date of the settlement, and it is shown that the remedy of the creditor is defeated or delayed by the existence of the settlement, it is immaterial whether the debtor was or was not solvent after making the settlement." Their Lordships seem to be of opinion that the proposition, as a mere abstract proposition, goes too far. It does not seem, however, that there will be any practical difference. Their Lordships adhere to the rule that the consequences of the settlement interpret the intention with which it was made, whereas the Vice-Chancellor appeared to think that the Court must be able to infer an actual conscious intent to defraud creditors, before it could rightly set aside a voluntary settlement under the statute of Elizabeth.

LEGAL EDUCATION FOR THE BAR.

While the details of the legal education scheme now on foot are as yet undetermined, is perhaps the best time to pass in review the general posture of the matter.

The Inns of Court were once a legal university in which each student was brought under a definite educational system; under which system no one was admissible to the degree of barrister, till he had undergone the educational process. Very possibly in those less levelling days, and in the absence of modern publicity, there was favouritism occasionally, but at any rate—and this is the fact that most concerns us—our ancestors professed not to let any one become a barrister till he had been taught his business. We do not at present make the same profession.

With regard to solicitors there is a much stronger prima facie reason in favour of a compulsory educational test than in the case of the bar. Solicitors are employed by the lay public to transact for them a technical description of business relating to a subject of which the latter are quite ignorant. The employers therefore, not being able to judge whether a solicitor possesses the necessary knowledge, it is necessary that some public body should judge for them on a large scale; and that is done by the Incorporated Law Society. But with respect to the bar the case is different. Those who employ counsel are themselves lawyers, and consequently competent to judge whether any particular barrister does or does not understand his business. It is said, therefore, that practically a barrister will only acquire a practice by showing himself capable of conducting it, and that, consequently, there is no need of an educational test for counsel. Indeed, this was the view taken by Baron Martin in his evidence before the late commission. On the other hand, it is contended that this hardly applies to those instances, now much commoner than formerly, in which the young barrister is the son or nephew of a solicitor in large business, and is consequently pitchforked into practice as soon as he has been called to the bar. The distinction between the position of the barrister and the solicitor is a real one. A foreigner, if told that in England a young gentleman may, "as the fact is," get himself called to the bar without possessing the merest acquaintance with law, or without even having opened a law book, would very probably infer that barristers, as a class, are ignorant of law. The distinction just mentioned explains, perhaps, how it is that they are not so. But it cannot be accepted as a proof that it is not worth while to have a regular system of compulsory bar education. Indeed, the institution of an optional system of education presupposes that there should be a compulsory test. If the means of public education are worth offering, the rejection of the offer should be not permitted. The popular idea of the first few years of a young bar-student or barrister's career is not by any means an accurate one, at least if we may judge by the pictures of life and manners contained in the very numerous novels which the public write and the remainder of us skim occasionally. We find him usually represented as devoting himself to society and literary or dramatic authorship, until his chance suddenly befalls him in the shape of a "dock-brief," when he makes a very eloquent speech for the defence, and finds himself launched at once into a roaring practice; indeed, in the lady novelist's view, all barristers practice in the Criminal Court, and rhetoric is the only qualification necessary—A picture which is undoubtedly more picturesque, in the stagey sense, than that of a man grubbing by himself away at his law books and reports, sitting now and then in court to hear a particular point argued, sometimes doing, especially if intending himself for the Chancery Bar, a little "devilling" for an older practitioner,—laboriously preparing himself to be able to utilise his chances when they come to him, and at last creeping very gradually up into a practice. We may take it for granted that, not invariably, but in the large majority of cases, that is the manner in which a man who has succeeded at the bar has spent his years of studentship and brieflessness. Still there is an incompleteness about this educational process, taken even at its best; it is an education "picked up" haphazard; it resembles the meals which a tinker's pony picks up day by day off a scrubby common or roadside hedge-bottom, rather than the regular feeding of young stock on a rich pasture. Very much will always remain to be acquired during actual practice; indeed, however successful a student's education may have been, the number of facts he will learn during his many years of actual practice must, in the nature of things, far outnumber those learnt during the three or four years of his studentship. But when a solid substratum has been laid, the subsequent acquirements are more valuable than ever. More is learnt afterwards, and what is so learnt is better arranged and better remembered. The establishment of the law university is intended to ensure this foundation in every case.

There is one point which we should not omit to notice, inasmuch as it has been laid hold of both by the advocates of the change and by those who consider it unnecessary. We mean the effect of a compulsory test on that class of barristers who are barristers in name only, who never intend practising and do not practise, but are called to the bar, as the phrase is, for "ornamental" purposes, before they take up their abodes in the country as county gentlemen and magistrates. It is said that these men will no longer enter the profession of which at present they are only nominal members, and that the prestige of the bar will suffer in consequence. It is right to attach great importance to the maintenance of the bar prestige, but in the main (though, of course, the two things react on each other to some extent) these "ornamental" barristers are to be considered as attracted by the prestige, and not as conferring it themselves. Apart from that, there is no earthly reason why a man should be allowed to bear the name of a lawyer if he knows no law and does not mean to practise, and many good reasons why he should not be allowed. We believe, too, the result will be, that this class of men will consider the call to the bar worth attaining at the cost of undergoing the education, and that by this means the standard of legal knowledge among country J.P.'s will be materially raised—an elevation which it certainly stands in need of.

Yet, in looking forward to the new state of things, we must guard ourselves from disappointment by not raising our expectations too high. We are not to fancy that a student's examination can do everything. It will be a guarantee that each man who has passed it has learnt so much as renders him fit to pass the threshold of a profession in which he will have to learn a great deal more. The students will not step into their profession, like so many Minervas springing out of Jupiter's head, armed in complete panoply of knowledge. It would be scarcely more possible to work an examination system the testing measure of which should be the knowledge which is or ought to be possessed by a barrister making say £1,000 a-year, than to work an examination test for the bench. We are not now referring to the heterogeneous nature of the knowledge possessed by an able practitioner, comprising every description of information, from dry historical rules of law to points of practice and undefinable experiences gained in practice, but to the fact, a priori one, so far as examinations are concerned, that it is impossible to make a pass-examination a measure of the attainments of the practising members of a profession. But it is possible by strict care and vigilance to prevent the pass-examination from degenerating, as all pass-examinations tend to degenerate, downwards and crumwards; and this we hope the senate of the new university will look to. It is not to be forgotten that there are qualities which the barrister should possess, besides that of legal knowledge; tact, for instance, self-possession, the power of speaking, and other things which go to sum up the attributes of a good advocate. It is as impossible to test these as it would be unfair and injudicious to frame a test which should gauge the one to the very bottom and ignore the others. But the test, if kept up to a proper standard, will tend to keep these qualifications in their proper place—as subservient to, and not as superseding the necessity of, a knowledge of law.

This leads us to a topic on which we wish to throw out a suggestion. It is neither desirable nor possible to revive the old legal university in its details, but we are not at all sure that the old system of "moots" might not be revived to advantage, for the benefit of the more advanced students. The reader doubtless remembers that in olden times every student of an inn of court was required to perform a certain number of these exercises, at which he sustained public arguments with other students on law points. These oral disputations were then common to all universities, though they have now long since given way to the modern system of examinations by means of written question and answer. People now living can remember when the bare ceremonial of disputations in the schools still lingered at Oxford and Cambridge, but even the formality has now been abolished, and justly so, since it has long been devoid of vitality. We incline to think that for law students some assistance of the kind towards acquiring the art of speaking might be judiciously extended, especially for those who are intended for the Chancery bar, where effective speaking is not at present much cultivated. This, however, is a mere suggestion which we throw out for what it may be worth; and, as solicitors transact a good deal of advocacy in the bankruptcy and other courts, the "moot" system, if revived, should, of course, embrace both branches of the students.

The foregoing remarks have been suggested by the paper, which we printed last week, of the Legal Education Association; and we have addressed ourselves in the first instance to the case of the bar, because, unlike their brethren, the solicitors, the bar have as yet no compulsory education whatever.

EFFECT AS AN ESTOPPEL OF THE DECLARATION OF VALUE IN VALUED POLICIES.

The contract of marine insurance is a contract of indemnity, and consequently the assured is only entitled to recover, in case of loss, an amount which will compensate him for the pecuniary damage actually sustained by him. It has, however, become a very common practice for the insurers and the insured to fix at the time of insurance the value of the thing insured, so as to avoid the necessity of ascertaining its actual value if it should be lost. The value thus agreed upon is, in the absence of fraud, conclusive between the parties. On proof of loss, the insurer must pay the amount or proportion of the amount at which he agreed that the subject of the insurance should be valued.

This system of insuring by valued policies, as they are called, is simple enough when there is only one policy on the vessel or goods insured, or even when there is more than one policy, if the same value is declared in each. When, however, there are several valued policies, and the declared value differs in each, most difficult questions of law may arise; and, as the decisions on these questions are not in accordance with one another, the law is at present in an unsettled state.

One of the first cases on this subject is Bousfield v. Barnes (4 Camp. 229), in 1815. There a vessel was insured by the plaintiff by a policy in which she was valued at £8,000, and also by another policy with other underwriters, in which she was valued at £6,000. The vessel was in fact worth more than £8,000. She was lost, and the plaintiff recovered £6,000 on the first policy and then sued on the second policy. The underwriters on the second policy argued that, as the value of the vessel was declared to be £6,000 only in their policy, and as the plaintiff had recovered that amount for the loss of his vessel, he must be taken to have received a complete indemnity for the loss so far as the defendants were concerned. Lord Ellenborough, however, held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. He said: "I think the valuation in this policy is only conclusive in settling a loss upon it between the assured and the underwriters who have subscribed it, without taking into consideration what has been transacted between the assured and third persons. If a total loss happens these underwriters shall not pay more than the amount of the valuation; and if there be a partial loss the valuation regulates the amount of the average contribution. I will likewise take care that the assured do not recover upon the whole more than the real value of the subject-matter insured. But I think it is not enough for the underwriters on a particular policy to show that the assured has received from another quarter the amount of the valuation in that policy, unless this amounts in point of fact to a complete indemnity."

Bruce v. Jones (11 W. R. 371), 1863, is diametrically opposed to Bousfield v. Barnes. In Bruce v. Jones the plaintiff's vessel was insured by four policies, in which she was valued at £3,000, £3,000, £5,000 and £3,200 respectively. The vessel was lost. The plaintiff recovered on the first three policies £3,126. It was held in an action on the fourth policy that the plaintiff was entitled to recover only the difference between £3,200, the value declared in the policy sued upon, and the £3,126, the amount actually received by him on the other policies. In this case no question turned on the actual value of the vessel, about which in fact there was conflicting evidence. In the view taken by the Court the value of the vessel did not affect the decision. If the principle of Bousfield v. Barnes had been applied to the facts in Bruce v. Jones the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover from the defendant such a sum as would, together with the sum actually received on the other policies, amount to a complete indemnity, in fact, for the loss of the vessel (irrespective of the value declared in the policy sued on), subject only to this, that in no case could the defendant be liable for more than £3,200, the value fixed by his policy. If this principle had been adopted of course it would have been necessary to ascertain the actual value of the vessel.

The decision in Bruce v. Jones, has given rise to a good deal of comment, and it is no doubt open to this observation that it appears to produce the curious result that the amount recoverable by a person in the position of the plaintiff in Bruce v. Jones, depends upon the chronological order in which the actions are commenced upon the different policies. For instance, suppose that a vessel worth £10,000 is insured in two policies for £5,000 each, in one of which the value is fixed at £5,000 and in the other at £10,000. If the owner were to recover £5,000 on the first policy he could subsequently recover another £5,000 on the second, but if he first recovered £5,000 on the second he could not subsequently get anything on the first policy, because, as between him and the underwriters, by that policy the value of the vessel is only £5,000, and that amount he has received, and is therefore to be considered as completely indemnified. The actual decision in Bruce v. Jones did not involve this result, but this seems the consequence of the judgment, and Channell, B., although concurring in the decision, says "I think that some inconvenience might result from the rule which has been laid down, and it is not satisfactory to me that if the order assessing [the damages] had been inverted a different amount would have been recovered." In Wilson v. Nelson (33 L. J. Q. B. 220), 1864, Shee, J., expressly says, "I cannot but think that Lord Ellenborough was right in Bousfield v. Barnes. . . . And I adhere to his opinion, notwithstanding a recent case, Bruce v. Jones, for none of the cases seem really to affect the doctrine of Lord Ellenborough."

The North of England, &c., Association v. Armstrong (18 W. R. 520), decided last January, has an important bearing upon the principle discussed in Bousfield v. Barnes and Bruce v. Jones, although the decision was upon another point. The facts of the case were as follow:—The defendants insured a vessel for £6,000 by a policy with the plaintiffs, in which the vessel's value was fixed at £6,000. The vessel was run down by another vessel (which was one of the perils insured against) and totally lost. The plaintiffs paid the defendants £6,000. The vessel was, for the purposes of the case, assumed to be worth £9,000. Subsequently, the defendants obtained £5,500 from the ship that ran down their vessel as compensation for the loss. The plaintiffs claimed the whole of this on the ground that they had paid, as for a total loss of the vessel, the total value as declared in the policy, and that the defendants must, therefore, be taken to have received a complete indemnity from such payment, and the plaintiffs were consequently entitled to the £5,500 on the same principle that would have undoubtedly entitled them to any salvage on the vessel. The defendants admitted that the declared value was conclusive in an action on the policy, but endeavoured to distinguish the case of an action not founded on the policy itself. The plaintiffs were held entitled to recover, on the ground that "where the value of a vessel insured is stated in the policy in a manner to be conclusive between the two parties, the insurer and the insured, as regards the whole value of the thing insured, then in respect of all rights and obligations which arise upon the policy of insurance the parties are estopped between themselves from disputing the value of the thing insured as stated in the policy."

It is obvious that this decision may practically affect most materially the legal position of parties in cases like Bousfield v. Barnes and Bruce v. Jones. There seems but little, if any, difference in principle, when considering whether a shipowner has received an indemnity for the loss of his vessel, between compensation paid for negligence which caused the loss, and money paid under an insurance in consequence of the loss. The decision we are discussing decides that such compensation is to be treated in these cases as if it were in the nature of salvage, and there appears to be every reason for supposing that money recovered on an insurance would be regarded in the same light. Assuming that to be so it would follow that in the case we put, of an insurance by two policies for £5,000 each, the vessel being valued, in one at £5,000, and in the other at £10,000, the insured would gain nothing by suing, first on the policy of the lower, and afterwards on that of the higher declared value, because anything obtained in the second action in excess of the lower declared value would, according to The North of England, &c. v. Armstrong, belong to the underwriters of the lower policy after they had paid the full amount of the value therein declared.

This is made still clearer by the words of Cockburn, C.J., in that case. He says, "It seems to me, further, to be altogether monstrous to say that when there is a case of a valued policy and an open policy [which, of course, might raise precisely the same point as where there are two policies at different values] it is to depend upon the question of which party is first sued, whether the underwriter shall or shall not be bound to pay the full value in the policy."

The result of the North of England, &c. v. Armstrong, therefore, seems to be to limit the amount of indemnity which can be obtained where there are several valued policies to the amount of the lowest value at which the thing insured is declared in any one of the policies. This is not the actual decision, and perhaps is not the necessary, although it seems the logical, result of the case. There must be further litigation before the law is settled. It is clear, however, that insurers would do well, in the present state of the law, to be careful how they insure by policies in which less than the full value is declared. By so doing they may possibly lose in effect their right to obtain an actual indemnity even when other insurances have been made by open policies, or by policies in which the full value is accurately stated. Curious questions may arise under the principle of The North of England, &c. Company v. Armstrong as to the rights of insurers inter se, and against the insured where there are several policies of different values; but at present we have not space to enter this branch of the question.

The three decisions we have discussed may be thus briefly summed up:—Bousfield v. Barnes decides that where a vessel is insured by several policies of different declared values the insurer is entitled to an actual indemnity for the loss sustained (irrespective of the declared values) in an action on any of the policies; subject to this, that in no case are the underwriters of each policy liable to pay more than the value declared in that policy.

Bruce v. Jones decides that under such circumstances the value of the thing insured (and, therefore, the amount of the indemnity) is conclusively fixed, for all the purposes of the action, by the value declared in the policy sued upon. The North of England, &c. Association v. Armstrong, rules that the value declared in a policy is not only conclusive for all the purposes of an action on the policy, but also "in respect of all rights and obligations which arise upon the policy of insurance."

THE BALLOT SCHEME.

No. II.

We gave last week nearly in the language of the bill, but more nearly in their true order, the various steps to be taken at a ballot according to the Government scheme, and our readers will be able to judge for themselves how far the objects of the bill are attained.

The objects to be attained by any ballot scheme are, we apprehend, four in number: first, to enable all persons who desire it to keep their votes secret; secondly, to force those who do not desire it to keep to themselves all proofs of the votes actually given by them, both in order to assist in the protection of others, and also in order to prevent persons being able to produce proof of their votes, and so establish a claim to a promised bribe or anything of the kind; thirdly, to enable votes of personators and disqualified persons to be struck off on a scrutiny; and, fourthly, to put a sufficient check upon the officers having the management of the poll, so as to secure that it shall be both impartially and accurately taken by them, and that the constituency shall be satisfied that this is the case.

Now, in our opinion, the last is the most important point of the four, and whatever is to be the order of preference as between the first three of the objects, which it is desired to attain if possible, they must all be subordinated to the last. It is obvious that in the Government scheme the third object is preferred to the first—that is to say, the possibility of a complete scrutiny is provided for, while only what we have called practical and not absolute secrecy is attained. By practical secrecy we mean that the great majority of votes will be secret, though the accidental disclosure of a vote here and there will not be impossible. However these points may be settled, we have a preliminary objection to the Government scheme, that in its present shape it does not seem to secure that the public will have confidence in the fairness of the proceedings, though with slight modifications it might probably do so. The system of counterfoils not to be inspected by anyone till after a vote has been disallowed is sufficient to give general protection to the voters, and it seems unnecessary to make the elaborate provisions of the bill as to when the papers are to be face upwards and when back upwards; this appears to be meant to prevent an agent of good memory catching sight of the mark on the back of a paper used by a particular voter, and afterwards catching sight of the mark again, and noticing how the votes are given. But as the agent who is to see the vote given and the one who is to see it counted are not permitted to be the same person, there can be no danger of this taking place. Of course, if it is to be understood that the marks by which the ballot papers are to be distinguished are to be consecutive numbers, and that the first voter coming to vote should have paper number one and so on in order, as appears to be supposed by some of the opponents of the bill, it would be comparatively easy to identify votes. We do not, however, understand that this is intended, and it certainly is not necessary to the scheme. It seems to us that the fullest facilities ought to be given to the candidates and their agents, for investigating everything that is done by the officers, with the single exception of the entries made in the counterfoils. Even the returning officer is not bound by the bill as drawn to check the returns of the presiding officers as to the manner in which they have disposed of the papers they have entrusted to them. He may do it, and probably would, but the candidates ought to be permitted to do so too. Again, it is not clearly provided that the agents are to see the ballot papers so as to judge of the propriety of the returning officers' decision as to their admissibility, nor is it even provided that the returning officer shall keep separately the papers which he rejects, so that it will be impossible afterwards to say which he has rejected. The result will be that in every case where the slightest suspicion arises as to the manner in which the poll has been added up, it will be necessary to present a petition for a scrutiny, in order to get the order of a competent court for an inspection of the documents. In the same way a petition must be presented in order to ascertain how the tendered duplicate votes, if added, would affect the poll. There would be no objection to having these made public. We should add that not only are the powers given to agents of the candidates most limited, but that they are further fettered by a declaration of secrecy, and by penalties for disclosing even their suspicions, so that any information they may acquire could not be made use of on a scrutiny. There is, however, one point on which a further restriction might be put upon the agents present at the polling station, without interfering with their usefulness. They might be expressly forbidden, under a heavy penalty, to take any notes of the numbers or marks on the voting papers used, in case of their seeing them. The taking of all notes could not be forbidden, but the observance of the restriction might be enforced by empowering the presiding officer to inspect, of his own accord, all notes taken at the polling station, whenever he thought fit or was requested by any agent or voter to do so. Again, we think some of the powers given to the presiding officer are liable to abuse. As to blind persons, we think they ought not to be forced to depend upon the honesty of the officer, but that they ought to have the option either of allowing him to mark their paper secretly or openly in the presence of both the agents, or else of having it done for them by some friend selected by themselves. As to persons who cannot read, if their votes were rejected altogether it would be a simple method of applying practically an educational test, which has often been admitted to be good in theory but impossible to carry out in practice. Again, with reference to the spoiled papers, if a voter shows that he has put a mark against a candidate favoured by the presiding officer, it may be much more difficult for the voter to prove to his satisfaction that he has made a mistake in recording his vote, so as to get another paper, than it would if he had voted first for the other candidate. There seems no appeal from a decision of the presiding officer on this point, whether he refuses the request or accedes to it. As regards voters who cannot read and voters who make mistakes with their papers, the case is no doubt a difficult one to deal with satisfactorily, but the difficulty is one common to all systems of ballot.

Passing on now to the schemes that have been suggested in place of that of the Government; the first is that of Mr. Leatham, who wishes, instead of the system of counterfoils, that the voting papers used by each voter shall be identified when necessary by the name or register number of the voter being written on the paper in invisible ink by the returning officer. If the ink answers its purpose, the writing is to be invisible until the paper is heated to a particular degree of temperature, and after becoming visible then, is to disappear as the paper cools. Upon the occasion of a scrutiny, each time a vote is held had all the voting papers used at the election will have to be baked until the numbers appear. The required number will then have to be sought for amongst the lot, and when found the vote given by that paper will be struck off the poll. The baking process will have to be repeated for each vote disallowed, but whether the personal presence of the election judge will be required we are not aware. It is, we think, scarcely necessary to discuss this plan, as we cannot conceive its being really adopted. It is obvious that, while it would answer the purpose of securing secret voting in the absence of accidents, as would also the Government Bill, it is not much less liable to accidents which would result in the disclosure of the votes. Absolute invisibility of the writing would be dependent, not merely on the accuracy of the chemist who compounded the ink, but on such matters as the absolute cleanliness of the pens and the ink-stands.

The scheme that will be most formidable to the Government measure is that to be brought forward by Mr. Henry James, Q.C., a gentleman who, it is needless to say, is, from his knowledge of election law, far more competent to deal practically with the subject than the majority of members of Parliament. Mr. James proposes that the ballot shall be absolutely secret, with no marks at all on the voting papers by which they may be afterwards identified. Under this scheme a complete scrutiny will, therefore, be impossible, but by a few amendments in the law, of a comparatively simple character, a practical scrutiny will be possible, which will perhaps answer the purpose. Certainly scrutinies are now very uncommon, but their infrequency is scarcely a complete test of their value. The possibility of having a scrutiny no doubt does much to repress unfair practices such as personation or voting by unqualified persons, to which there would be a much greater temptation if no scrutiny could be had. Whether complete secrecy of votes or the possibility of a complete scrutiny ought to be preferred, is perhaps a political rather than a legal question, and as such is beyond our province. It is important, however, to see to what extent a scrutiny is possible when the votes are completely secret. At present, on a scrutiny, votes may be struck off—1st, if given by persons improperly on the register; 2ndly, if given by persons properly on the register, but who have subsequently become incapacitated; 3rdly, if given by persons professing to be, but not really on the register. Votes may also be added if tendered by persons who ought to be on the register, but who have been struck off by the revising barrister, and if tendered by persons on the register whose vote has been refused owing to some one else having already voted improperly on their qualification. Now, as regards votes to be added, no difficulty will be caused by a system of secret voting. It probably will be impossible to keep the tendered votes absolutely secret, but this will not be of much importance. Regulations can easily be made similar to those contained in the Government Bill with regard to tendered votes, which will permit of the votes being added if necessary on a scrutiny. With regard to votes which ought to be struck off on a scrutiny, Mr. James makes several propositions which provide for nearly all the cases.

As regards the first class—viz., votes given by persons improperly on the register—even at present they can only be struck off if they have been retained on the register by an express decision of the revising barrister. Mr. James proposes that the register in all cases shall be conclusive that the persons whose names appear on it had a right to vote at the day up to which the register was made up, that is the 31st of July under the present law. This is not really a very great change, and cannot be looked upon as a hardship by anyone. It will necessitate, however, somewhat more attention to the revision than has been sometimes bestowed upon it. As regards the next class, Mr. James provides for a large number of the cases included in it, by a clause enacting that wherever a person is shown to have voted, who was disqualified on the ground of his having been bribed, treated, unduly influenced, employed on behalf of a candidate, or on the ground of any electoral offence of the kind, he shall be presumed conclusively to have voted for the candidate in whose favour he was so influenced, and a vote shall be struck off the poll of that candidate. There is certainly no hardship in this. As regards personators, many of these would come under the last head, as in most cases of personation there is some bribe or payment given for the act, and where this could be shown a vote would be struck off accordingly. As to the other cases, however, viz., of personation where it could not be proved to have been done at the instigation of a candidate or his agent, and of other disqualified persons voting, it is not possible without the means of identifying the voting papers to devise a means of striking off a vote, unless the want of qualification was discovered when the vote was given. Mr. James, therefore, confines himself to provisions likely to render the event as little likely to occur as possible, and to facilitate its detection at the time. He wishes to make wilful personation felony punishable with penal servitude; and he also proposes that on every person coming up to vote the presiding officer shall announce publicly the name and qualification that he gives; for instance,—“John Smith claims to vote for a qualification in High-street.” Thus a personator will run the risk of any person in the crowd knowing either him or the right man. It is a further part of the scheme, if we understand it rightly, that the agents present are to have power to protest against the vote of any person either for personation or as being disqualified, or the like. When such a protest is made the vote is to be received, but the paper is to be marked by the returning officer. Sufficient penalties, either upon the agent or the candidate or both, are to be provided so as to prevent such protests being made without reasonable ground, and for the purpose really of detecting how a particular person votes. In this way the votes of persons disqualified for non-residence or the like may be protested against and eventually struck off, as well as the votes of personators. Mr. James's scheme seems to us to meet the cases that are most likely to occur in practice; to give, in fact, a practical though not a complete scrutiny, and we have no doubt that it will be attentively considered by the House, even if it is not adopted.

THE SEPARATE ESTATE OF A WIFE.

NO. III.

In our last article we investigated the question, what sort of engagements or transactions on the part of a married woman will fasten liabilities on her separate estate; and we found that, roughly speaking, it is bound by her “general engagements.” Having therefore determined what transactions will bind, it remains for us to inquire what property will be bound.

But before we thus leave the active side for the passive, we must just pause to notice a point as to the enforcement of the creditor's remedy. He cannot reach the separate estate till he has got a decree (ante, p. 627), unless he can show a contract specifically charging it. Meanwhile, if the married woman assigns, even after the bill filed, to a purchaser without notice, the creditor's remedy may be practically lost to him. He will have no remedy against the property in the hands of the purchaser, because the latter took without notice, and he will have no remedy against the married woman, because from the nature of the case, he has none against her personally, and she has no separate property for him to reach. This very circumstance occurred in Johnson v. Gallagher (9 W. R. 506, 3 D. G. F. & J. 522). After bill filed, the woman assigned to a third party by bill of sale; the bill was amended by inserting the assignee as a co-defendant, with a charge of collusion; but the charge not being substantiated, Lord Justice Turner (whose judgment we have already cited on the antecedent question), held that there was nothing which could be reached by a decree. Having drawn attention to this important item of practice, we will go on to examine what property will be bound.

Vice-Chancellor Kindersley laid it down very emphatically in Blatchford v. Woolley (11 W. R. 478, 2 Dr. & Sm. 206), that though the corpus of personalty can be settled to the separate use of a married woman, when the subject-matter is realty, you cannot so settle the fee; you cannot turn more than a life interest into separate estate, though you may bestow a power of appointment over the remainder; and in Hoare v. Osborne (12 W. R. 661, 33 L. J. N. S. Ch. 590), the same judge, in 1864, seemed to treat this as a matter beyond question. But Lord Westbury a year later, in Taylor v. Meads (13 W. R. 394, 33 L. J. N. S. Ch. 590), distinctly adopted the view that real estate may be settled to separate use in fee. Taylor v. Meads is, therefore, the governing case at present; and we certainly know no reason, from the nature of real property or the history of its law, why this “creature of the Court of Equity”—separate estate—should not embrace the fee simple in real property. (A portion of Lord Westbury's judgment is quoted in our first article.)

It will be convenient before prosecuting this part of our subject further, to dispose of those cases in which the wife, as a fact, has merely a life estate with a power of appointment. These cases class themselves as follows:—(1) Where the wife has a power of appointment by deed or will; (2) where she has only a power of appointment by will; in which class we must consider separately (a) the case in which there is a default of the exercise of the power, and (b) the case in which the power has been exercised.

(1.) Where the wife has the power to appoint by deed or will, the Courts, to use the words of Lord Justice Turner in Johnson v. Gallagher (ubi sup., at page 518), “have certainly held the corpus of the property to be subject to the debts and engagements of the married woman: Allen v. Papworth (1 Ves. Sen. 163); Hulme v. Tenant (1 Bro. C.C. 15); Heatley v. Thomas (15 Ves. 596), although it is to be observed that during the life of the married woman, the Court has never gone further than to affect the limited interest.” As to personalty, we do not apprehend that there is any difficulty about the Court laying its hand upon the corpus, if needs be: as to realty (assuming that Lord Westbury, and not Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, is right as to its capability of being settled in fee to separate use), the Court in some of the older cases (Hulme v. Tenant for instance) seems to have entertained doubts as to the manner in which the fee could be made available; but we conceive that there is no real objection, and we do not find that any of the judges have said more than that the thing had not been done as yet.

(2a.) Where the wife has a power of appointment by will only, and the power has not been exercised, there is no doubt that the debts and engagements of the married woman cannot prevail against the persons entitled in remainder (Johnson v. Gallagher, at page 517; Nail v. Panter, 5 Sim. 555).

(2b.) Where the wife has a power of appointment by will only, and that power has been exercised. Lord Justice Turner touched this point in Johnson v. Gallagher (at page 517), and, considering it doubtful, left the question open. In Norton v. Turville (2 P. W. 144), a case mentioned by Lord Justice Turner as apparently a case favouring the creditors' right, the disposing power was by deed as well as by will, so that the case belongs rather to class (1). In Hughes v. Wells (9 Ha. 773), the Lord Justice had hazarded an obiter dictum, that when the power by will had been exercised, the property might become assets for the payment of the creditors. But Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, in Vaughan v. Vanderstegen (2 Dr. 165), afterwards examined the question very logically and exhaustively, and succeeded in showing that the property so appointed cannot, or rather ought not, on principle, to be treated as assets. His reasoning was this:—The wife's debts can operate only on her separate estate and within its limits; a power of appointment is no part of her separate estate; it is not even a creature of the Court of Equity at all, being a power recognised at common law as exercisable by a feme covert; true, that when property is limited to trustees to such purposes as the wife shall appoint, the Court of Equity alone can take cognisance of it, but that Court does so, not by virtue of the doctrine of separate use, but as following the common law. The difference is the difference between power and property. In spite of the doubts expressed by Lord Justice Turner in Johnson v. Gallagher, we think this reasoning of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley disposes of the question. It will be observed that it is not affected by the question at issue between the Vice-Chancellor and Lord Westbury, as to the capability of the fee of real estate to be settled to separate use.

We have now disposed of the life estate with power of appointment, and may return to the real estate question. If Vice-Chancellor Kindersley is right, it follows, from our investigation of (2b), that there never can be anything beyond the life estate available for the creditors. If Lord Westbury is right (and we repeat our opinion that he is), it is unquestioned that the creditors can reach the life interest; but can they touch the fee? We apprehend that they can. We are aware that in the older cases judges, as we said just now when discussing another point, have shown themselves disposed to shrink from touching the corpus; but we believe that there is no foundation for any such reluctance in principle, and think that the Court should now, if called upon in any case to do so, abandon these scruples, as they abandoned their former notion that the separate estate could be bound only by instrument in writing or even under seal. The practitioner, however, will remember that this is only our opinion.

There is a question sometimes raised in cases where a wife has a power of appointment exercisable over property settled but not settled to her separate use, whether a particular exercise of the power which has partially failed as to its special objects—as, for instance, in consequence of some of the appointees predeceasing the testator—has or has not converted the fund into a part of the wife's general personal estate; that question, however, is foreign to our subject, and we only mention it lest we should be deemed to have overlooked it, and as a suggestion to any student who may have read these articles.

We have now concluded our sketch of the subject of separate estate as the law now stands. It has been merely a sketch, but we have endeavoured to investigate the main topics thoroughly. In the face of the proposals now before the legislature for a radical change in the property status of married women, it is important to comprehend accurately what that status is at present.

COVENANTS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

Leather Cloth Company v. Lonsont, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 572, L. R. 9 Eq. 345.

It is a very ancient part of the policy of the law to discourage restraints on trade, as being injurious to the public. Covenants in general restraint of trade are void on grounds of public policy (Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181), because the law will not suffer a man to contract not to do what his own interest and the public welfare require him to do (Homer v. Ashford, 3 Bing. 328). Covenants in partial restraint of trade, however, are valid, provided they be reasonable, having regard to the subject-matter of the contract. The restriction may be unlimited in point of time (Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 A. & E. 438), but the area of exclusiveness must be limited and defined—e.g., a butcher's covenant never to sell meat within five miles of a particular place would be good (Elves v. Crofts, 10 C. B. 241); whereas a dyer's covenant not to use his craft for two years would be bad (Year Book, 2 Hen. 5, b). See the case of The Tailors of Ipswich (11 Rep. 526) as to the policy of the common law. In a case where London was held to be a reasonable area of exclusion, Lord Wynford said, "We think it would be better to lay down such a limit as, under any circumstances, would be a sufficient protection to the interests of the contracting party; and if the limit stipulated for does not exceed that, to pronounce the contract valid" (Mallam v. May, 11 M. & W. 667). In other words, the restriction ought to be such as to afford a fair protection to the interests of the contracting parties, yet not so large as to interfere with the interests of the public, who are concerned in men using the craft in which they profess skill. The dictum of Campbell, C.J., in Tallis v. Tallis (1 E. & B. 39), to the effect that such restrictive covenants have been supported where the area of exclusion is apparently greater than the area of the contracting party's practice, seems to imply this, that in determining whether or not a particular restriction is too general, the Court will consider how far the interests of the public are thereby affected, and if the detriment appear to be trivial, will not inquire whether the contracting party's area of trade is more than covered by the restriction.

Whether a covenant in partial restraint of trade be reasonable or not, must depend on the subject-matter of the contract. Many cases of this class are collected in Avery v. Langford (Kay 668, note). One of the most striking cases on this subject is Whitaker v. Hors, 8 Beav. 383, where an attorney's covenant not to practice in any part of Great Britain during twenty years from the date of the covenant was enforced by injunction. This case is not on all fours with some cases at common law (Ward v. Byrne, 5 M. & W. 548), but has not, so far as we are aware, been overruled. The decision in Whitaker v. Hors rests partly on the difficulty there was of defining the area of exclusion under the circumstances of the case, otherwise than generally. But to restrain an attorney from practising as such in any part of Great Britain comes very near being a general restraint. In Leather Cloth Company v. Lonsont the area of exclusion embraced not only the United Kingdom, but also the Continent. It was contended that this restriction was practically unlimited and amounted to a general restraint of trade. The Vice-Chancellor held that the restriction was not too large. In determining what is a fair area of exclusion at the present day regard must be had to the increased facilities of communication and carriage of goods, which renders competition formidable at a far greater distance than was formerly the case. In Leather Cloth Company v. Lonsont, however, it is to be observed that the subject-matter of the restriction was a trade secret, not simply the goodwill of a business. There is an authority for the proposition—we do not say that it will be followed at the present day—that a man who uses a trade secret may restrain himself generally from the use of it (Bryson v. Whitehead, 1 S. & S. 74, where, however, a limit of space was introduced into the agreement). However this may be, we apprehend that the Court, where a secret of trade is the subject-matter of the contract will often, as in Leather Cloth Company v. Lonsont consider a very large area of exclusion to be not unreasonable, provided there be an adequate consideration.

WINDING-UP—CONTRIBUTIONS OF PAST MEMBERS, HOW APPLIED.

Re Accidental and Marine Insurance Company, V.C.S., 18 W. R. 538.

As the law now stands (Companies Act, 1862, s. 38), "past members," i.e., persons who have ceased to be members within one year prior to the commencement of the winding-up, are liable to contribute to the assets in respect of such debts only as were incurred prior to the time when their connection with the company ceased. With respect to the application of such contributions it was contended in this case that such contributions when received ought not to go into the general fund for distribution amongst the creditors, but be divided amongst those creditors only who were creditors at the time when the liability to contribute was incurred. The success of this contention would have rendered it necessary to settle a sort of list B. of creditors, and to inquire in every case to the payment of what debts the contributory was liable to contribute, a course clearly contrary to the policy of the Act, which is that creditors should be the creditors of the company, not of the members of the company. Besides this, if this contention were to prevail, there would be an end of paying creditors pari passu as provided by section 133, but some would get more than others, according to the date of their claims. The Vice-Chancellor accordingly held that such contributions ought to go into the general assets and be applied pari passu in paying all debts, past as well as subsequent. It appears then that section 38 applies only to the ascertaining the amount to be contributed by past members, and that as regards the application of the amount thus ascertained, section 133 is to prevail.

PRIORITY OF PAYMENT OF COSTS IN A WINDING UP BY THE COURT.

Ex parte Massey, M.R., 18 W. R. 444.

In Re Audley Hall Cotton Spinning Company (17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 76, L. R. 6 Eq. 245) the Master of the Rolls decided that in the winding up of a company the petitioner's costs are the first charge on the estate, and must be paid in full in priority to the costs of the liquidator. As regards the costs of the liquidator, Ex parte Massey decided that the bill of the liquidator's solicitor is payable before the liquidator's private remuneration. Where the liquidator has employed more than one solicitor, and the assets are not sufficient to pay the whole of the costs, the bills of costs of the successive solicitors will, as a general rule, be paid rateably as far as the assets will go; and the last solicitor is not entitled to be paid in priority to the first, as was said in Cormack v. Beisley (3 De G. & J. 157). In Re Audley Hall Cotton Spinning Company, however, the first solicitor having given up papers to his successor on an undertaking that his costs should be paid out of the estate, his costs were paid in full in priority to the second solicitor. Until the petitioner's costs and the costs of the winding up are provided for, the liquidator is not entitled to be paid his private remuneration, as distinguished from the bill of costs of his solicitor.

COMMON LAW.

EVIDENCE—ONUS OF PROOF—BREACH OF COVENANT NOT TO PERMIT A SALE ON DEMISED PREMISES WITHOUT LICENCE OF LESSOR.

Toleman v. Portbury, Ex. Ch., 18 W. R. 579.

The plaintiff in this case brought ejectment against the defendant, his tenant, for breach by the defendant of a covenant not to permit any sale by public auction to take place on the demised premises without the consent in writing of the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, &c. There were two questions in dispute, first, whether there was sufficient evidence that the defendant permitted the sale; secondly, whether the plaintiff was bound to prove as part of his own affirmative evidence that he had not given any licence to the defendant or whether the onus of proof that a licence had been given was on the defendant.

The first point turns rather on a question of fact than of law, and we shall not discuss it, but the question as to the onus of proof is of much more general importance. It was decided by Willes and Brett, JJ., and Pigott and Channell, BB., that the plaintiff was bound to prove the negative—viz., that there had been no licence. At the trial the plaintiff did not prove this and was nonsuited, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the nonsuit was right.

Under such circumstances as those of this case, the decision does not impose any hardship upon the plaintiff, because he is as able to prove that he had not given a licence as the defendant is to prove that the licence was given. The fact being equally in the knowledge of both parties, it is perhaps not unreasonable, according to the usual rule, that the plaintiff ought in such cases to prove all the facts necessary to establish his right to recover the premises, and the absence of a licence was as material to the success of his action as the fact of the sale. Circumstances might, however, exist which would render it almost impossible for the plaintiff to prove or even give any evidence of the non-existence of a licence. For instance, if the lessor in this case had died immediately after the sale on the premises by the lessee it would probably be impossible for the person entitled to the reversion to prove that no licence had been given by the lessor. It might, no doubt, be held in such a case that very slight evidence on the part of the reversioner would be sufficient to raise a presumption that no licence had been given, but it might be impossible for the reversioner to give any evidence at all upon the subject. The judgments, however, do not deal with such questions as these, but lay down the rule in general terms which would seem to apply to all cases whatever.

That the rule was meant to have a very wide operation is shown by the fact that Doe v. Whitehead (8 Ad. & Ell. 571), where the rule was carried very far, is cited and approved in the judgments. In Doe v. Whitehead an action of ejectment was brought by a lessor against his lessee for breach by the lessee of a covenant to insure the demised house in some office in or near London. It was held that the plaintiff was bound to prove the negative—viz., that the defendant had not insured. This was evidently a difficult thing to do, and the plaintiff's counsel asked in argument, "Was the plaintiff to subpoena clerks from all the offices to show the insurance was not effected?" Lord Denman, in his judgment, says, "The proof may be difficult when the matter is peculiarly within the defendant's knowledge; but that does not vary the rule of law." In considering the practical effect of this rule, when applied to actions of ejectment, it must be remembered that a defendant in ejectment is not bound to answer interrogatories by the plaintiff when the answer would tend to show that he had incurred a forfeiture of his lease by a breach of one of the covenants: Pye v. Butterfield, (18 W. R. 178).

Littledale, J., also says, in Doe v. Whitehead, "when a landlord brings an action to defeat the estate granted to a lessee the onus of proof ought to lie on the plaintiff. It is true that if the action had been in covenant the onus would have lain on the defendant, but that does not show that it will so lie in a different form of action." Littledale, J., therefore seems to have thought that the consequences, which might result from a breach of covenant would affect the way in which the breach must be proved. If the plaintiff only asked for damages for the breach the defendant would have to prove the licence to commit the alleged breach; if the plaintiff asked to recover the estate in consequence of the breach, he must himself prove that the licence had not been given. This is not satisfactory, although there is no doubt some authority for this view of the law which is often expressed by saying that the law leans against a forfeiture.

In Toleman v. Portbury it is not said that there will be no exception to the rule requiring the proof of the negative by a plaintiff in ejectment, or that the rules of evidence in actions of ejectment are different from the rules in other actions; but it seems from several expressions in the judgment, that such was the opinion of the Court. For this reason we regret that the judgments were not fuller and more explicit on these points, especially as it is a decision of the Exchequer Chamber by which all inferior courts are of course bound.

PRACTICE—WITHDRAWAL OF JUROR UPON TERMS—TERMS NOT CARRIED OUT.

Norburn v. Hilliam, C.P., 18 W. R. 602.

Gibbs v. Ralph (14 M. & W. 804) decided that "it must be taken as a positive rule of practice that when the parties to a cause agree to withdraw a juror, that puts a final end to the litigation between them, and no future action can be brought for the same cause." If the action is afterwards proceeded with, or a second action brought, the defendant may apply to stay the proceedings as being against good faith (Chitty's Arch. Prac. 11th ed. 707).

In Norburn v. Hilliam a cause was sent from the Common Pleas to be tried in a county court. The cause came on for trial before a jury, and, on the suggestion of the judge it was agreed between the parties that a juror should be withdrawn, and that the judge should say what should be done in the matter. A juror was accordingly withdrawn, and subsequently the judge was ready to give his decision, but the defendant then refused to be bound by it, and consequently the judge gave no decision, as the defendant could not have been compelled to obey it.

The plaintiff then applied to the Court of Common Pleas for a rule that the judge should pronounce judgment or appoint a day for re-hearing. The argument against the rule was, that by the withdrawal of the juror the cause was at an end, and if there had been a breach of any agreement the plaintiff's remedy was by an action for such breach. The majority of the Court (Brett, J., dissenting) held that a day must be appointed for the re-hearing, as the withdrawal of the juror by the plaintiff was only, in effect, conditional upon the assent by the defendant to abide by the decision of the judge. As the defendant had now refused to be bound by the judge's order he could not avail himself of the other part of the agreement—viz., the withdrawal of the juror—to prevent the plaintiff from continuing the action.

It is clear that this decision is the only one which would do substantial justice between the parties. It would be obviously unfair that the withdrawal of a juror upon terms should be allowed to have its full effect, while the terms in consideration of which consent was given to the withdrawal are not performed. An action for the breach of the agreement on which the juror was withdrawn would, in most cases, afford no sufficient remedy, on account of the difficulty, if not impossibility, of arriving at any measure of damages. Even if a satisfactory measure of damages could be arrived at, it would not be reasonable that the party in default should have the option of paying damages or allowing the action to proceed, although it might perhaps be fair that such an option should be allowed to the party aggrieved.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT, 1868 (31 & 32 VICT., c. 125), s. 41—TAXATION OF COSTS.

Hill v. Peel, Broad v. Fowley, Pegler v. Gurney, C.P., 18 W. R. 605; Tillett v. Stracey, C.P., 18 W. R. 631.

We noticed a short time ago (ante 465) several late decisions in which there was a discussion of the principles which should govern the Courts in reviewing or refusing to review the decisions of the master on the taxation of costs. The general result of those cases is that the master is to use his discretion as to the amount of costs allowed, and that the Courts, while reserving to themselves full power to review taxation in all cases, will be slow to exercise that power when it is only a question of amount, but will generally do so when the master has acted on a wrong principle of taxation as distinguished from an erroneous discretion on the application of a right principle.

Since these cases have been decided other cases have come before the Court of Common Pleas, involving very similar questions under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868. Section 41 of that statute provides that the costs of a petition are to be defrayed by the parties as the Court or judge may determine, and are to be taxed as costs between attorney and client and are taxed in Chancery. The Court of Common Pleas has applied the same principle to these as to other cases, and laid down the general rule in the following passage in Pegler v. Gurney:—"The order of costs in each of these cases was general and without qualification . . . and therefore the parties entitled to costs were entitled to an indemnity for all costs that were reasonably incurred by them in the ordinary course of a matter of this nature, but not to any extraordinary or unusual expenses incurred in consequence of over-caution or over-anxiety as to any particular case, or from consideration of any special importance arising from the position . . . of either of the parties. . . . Such extraordinary costs as an attorney would not be justified in incurring without distinct and special instructions from his client ought not to be allowed, nor the costs of purely collateral proceedings. . . . A very wide discretion must necessarily be left to the taxing-officer, which must be exercised by him after a careful consideration of the particular circumstances of each case. Where a principle is involved [in the taxation] the Court will always entertain the question, and if necessary give directions to the master, but where it is a question whether the master has exercised his discretion properly, or it is a mere question as to the amount allowed, the Court is generally unwilling to interfere . . . unless there is very strong ground to show that the officer is wrong in the judgment which he has formed."

REVIEWS.

The Jurisprudence of Medicine in its relations to the Law of Contracts, Torts and Evidence, with a Supplement on the Liabilities of Vendors of Drugs. By JOHN ORDRONAU, LL.B., M.D., Professor of Medical Jurisprudence in the Law School of Columbia College, New York. Philadelphia: Johnson & Co.; London: Stevens & Haynes. 1869.

This work is intended to meet the wants of members both of the medical and the legal profession; it is, however, somewhat more suited to the former than the latter. It gives in reasonably precise form the law on most points of interest to the medical profession, while to members of the legal profession it may be convenient to have the law stated for them in a separate treatise instead of having to refer to other authorities. It is, however, a legal and not a medical work, and does not aim as does Dr. Taylor's work on Medical Jurisprudence, at giving to lawyers such elementary medical knowledge as will assist them in their conduct of inquiries in which medical questions are involved.

Of course much of the law on the subject is statute law; and this will prevent a considerable portion of the treatise from being of much use to English readers. Not only do the statutes of the various States in America differ from our own law, but they also differ considerably from each other. The author gives in a compact form the enactments in force in the various States, and in any case requiring comparison of the English and American law on the subjects within the scope of this work this collection of the statutes would be very useful.

The questions arising as to the admissibility and proper scope of the evidence of medical men in the capacity of experts are dealt with at length, and, we think, satisfactorily, by the author. He also gives a special chapter to "evidence in cases of alleged insanity," which, however, is rather discursive, and we fail to gather from it any clear idea of what the author's views on this perhaps the most important subject with which he deals are. To the legal profession perhaps the most instructive part of the work will be that devoted to the liability of vendors of drugs, a subject with which the author deals very fully. We are not aware that the points which seem to have been considerably discussed in America, especially in an interesting case of Thomas v. Winchester, 2 Selden, 397, have directly arisen in this country. In that case the wholesale dealer in drugs, through the fault of whose servants a dangerous drug had been labelled as an innocent one, was held liable to a person injured, who had purchased a portion of the drug from a retail dealer, into whose hands it had come through several intermediate purchasers from the wholesale dealer. The case somewhat resembled the recent case of George v. Skivington, 18 W. R. 118, before our Court of Exchequer; a case, however, presenting less difficulty than the American, and which was decided on somewhat different grounds, but which we think might have proceeded on the same grounds as the American, viz., that in cases of persons dealing in dangerous drugs there is a duty imposed to use due care, which does not arise exclusively out of the contract between the vendor and purchaser, and which therefore does not come within the rule restricting the right of suing to parties to the contract. Although we cannot congratulate Mr. Ordronaux on having produced a work of very general utility, at all events to readers in this country, yet we believe that those who require information on the special subjects embraced by it, will find the work well executed.

The Law of Protestant Curates in England and Ireland. By C. D. FIELD, M.A., LL.D. London: Butterworths.

This small volume contains, in a concise form, the law, common and statutory, which regulates the status of curates in England, and which until next January will regulate it in Ireland. The dedication to the author's father, "a curate for three and thirty years in that Church which has most justly been disestablished," proves that Mr. Field had a domestic reason for undertaking his task. Without some such personal incentive the object of the compilation is not very obvious. The information it contains appears to be accurate and well-arranged, but the subject is hardly worth a separate treatise.

COURTS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

(In Banco, before BOVILL, C.J., and WILLES and KEATING, JJ.)

June 4.—Burnett v. Prows.

Quain, Q.C., showed cause against a rule obtained last term, calling upon Mr. John Richardson, a Manchester attorney, to pay the amount of a debt and costs recovered in this action, to the plaintiff or his attorney. He stated that in June, 1869, Mr. Burnett instructed his attorney, Mr. Pinnell, to obtain payment of £60 from the defendant, a Greek, fearing he would become bankrupt or leave the country. Defendant saw the plaintiff, and asked him to take no steps in the matter, as he had paid the money to Mr. Richardson, his attorney. That was according to Mr. Burnett's affidavit; and anybody reading it would naturally think that Mr. Richardson had received the money and appropriated it to his own use. So far from that being the case, it was within the knowledge of Mr. Burnett and his attorney that Mr. Richardson had only got £40 from the defendant, and that this amount had been diverted to another creditor at defendant's request. They had also subsequently refused a cheque for the amount of the debt and costs, £70. It was a gross imputation upon an officer of the court, for which there was not the slightest foundation. The parties had agreed to refer the matter to Mr. Heelis, a solicitor, of Manchester; and neither the plaintiff nor his attorney then said the money had been misappropriated. On plaintiff refusing the cheque for £70, Mr. Richardson returned it to his client; and Mr. Heelis thought they ought to have accepted the money when it was offered to them. Mr. Pinnell, in his affidavit, said he had paid over the amount to his client, the plaintiff, and he applied that Mr. Richardson might, in turn, be ordered to pay it over to him. Defendant had since gone abroad. The action was tried at the Manchester Winter Assizes, and judgment given for the plaintiff. Mr. Richardson declared that, so far from having any money belonging to the defendant, the latter really owed him £50 for costs. Abortive proceedings had been taken in bankruptcy. Mr. Richardson had also a right to complain of certain attacks in the Law Times of December 18th, in a report of the assize proceedings. Those attacks were supposed to be at the instigation of the plaintiff's attorney.

Milward, Q.C., stated emphatically that Mr. Pinnell had nothing whatever to do with what had appeared in the Law Times.

BOVILL, C.J., said that if he had done so it was unprofessional conduct, and some professional man in Manchester could settle the matter; but it did not affect the question now before the Court.

Quain, Q.C., submitted that, inasmuch as the debt and costs had been offered and refused, the rule ought now to be discharged.

Milward, Q.C., in support of the rule, denied that it was shown that Mr. Pinnell or the plaintiff knew of the £40 having been appropriated to other purposes than those for which it was deposited with Mr. Richardson. All the difficulty in the case had been caused by Mr. Richardson's reticence and neglect to give proper instructions.

BOVILL, C.J., said that the plaintiff's attorney proceeded with the action simply for the purpose of costs. The judgment became fruitless, because the defendant went abroad. He (the Lord Chief Justice) should attribute the loss to the plaintiff's attorney, because he had gone on with this action instead of taking the decision of the Master. The matter between the attorneys was referred to Mr. Heelis, and he had given it in favour of Mr. Richardson. The plaintiff's attorney now came before the Court on behalf of his client. It seemed to him that Mr. Richardson had been completely exonerated in the matter; the plaintiff's attorney might have had £70 if he had chosen, and he thought the application entirely failed. The Master disposed of it; the plaintiff's attorney did not think fit to take advantage of it, and had taken his own course, and the plaintiff was now in a different position through his act and his going in for trifling costs. Upon the whole, the application failed, and the rule must be discharged.

WILLES and KEATING, JJ., concurred.

BAIL COURT.—June 8.

(In Banco, before MELLOR, J., and PIGOTT, B.)

Hill v. Brouning.

This was an appeal against a conviction by magistrates of a baker, under the Sale of Bread Act; the appellant was charged with having sold bread otherwise than by weight, and had been convicted. It was proved that the appellant had sold six loaves which varied in weight, from 3lb. 12oz. to 3lb. 7oz. It was shown that the appellant's practice was to charge a uniform price for his loaf, varying the weight according to the market; and in order to do this he weighed the dough before it was put into the oven, allowing a certain number of ounces for evaporation and other circumstances which tended to reduce the weight.

Hensman, for the appellant, contended that this was within the spirit of the statute, and that it was not requisite to weigh the loaf.

Mereweather, contra, was not called on.

The COURT did not conceive that the appellant had any moral intention of doing wrong; there was no such imputation against him, but he had not complied with the requirements of the Act. The intention of the Legislature was that "bread" should be sold by weight, and weighing "dough" was not weighing "bread." Therefore, the conviction was right.

This was the first instance of a judge of another Court being called in to assist a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench under the new arrangement.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

June 2.—Re Hine and Anthony.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 19, rules 138 & 140.

The bankrupts in this case had applied for the appointment of a sitting for order of discharge; and the matter had been referred by Mr. Registrar Spring-Rice to the Chief Judge for his opinion.

Bagley, in support of the application.

It appeared that the adjudication was obtained against the bankrupts on the 27th of April, and on the 14th of May the first sitting was held. At that meeting the bankrupts submitted a statement of a very satisfactory character to their creditors, and there seemed to be no doubt that a dividend of more than ten shillings in the pound would become payable. The bankrupts, upon their application for the appointment of a sitting for discharge, were met with the objection that they had not yet passed their examination, but it was submitted that they were entitled to ask for an appointment without waiting for the sitting for examination.

Bagley referred to section 19 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and rules 138 and 140.

The CHIEF JUDGE said there seemed to be no objection to the appointment of a sitting for order of discharge, and, if the examination should be passed, the discharge would stand upon its own merits. But if it appeared that the sitting had been fixed unnecessarily, and that creditors had been put to expense, the defendants might have to pay the costs.

Solicitors, Field, Roscoe, & Co.

Re Butler—Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 84 & 89.

The bankrupt, a superannuated Government officer, had been adjudicated in the usual mode, upon a creditors' petition. At the first meeting the creditors resolved not to appoint either a trustee or a committee of inspection, but that the registrar should act as trustee under the 84th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

Mr. Aldridge (solicitor) mentioned the matter to the Court in accordance with the registrar's report, and referred to the 89th section.

Mr. Hancock (solicitor) for creditors.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—No doubt the Court has power to set aside so much of the half-pay as may be necessary, but why not appoint a trustee? I do not see why the creditors, at their mere caprice, should resolve that the registrar discharge the duties which a trustee appointed by them ought to fulfil.

Mr. Hancock.—The creditors are desirous that the registrar should be appointed trustee.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—I dare say they are, but why should the trouble be thrust upon the registrar? The registrars will give all the assistance in their power to the execution of this Act of Parliament, but no reason exists why this duty should be thrust upon them? There must be a meeting appointed and a trustee nominated, and then an application may be made for the appropriation of such portion as may be necessary of the bankrupt's half-pay.

COUNTY COURTS.

LAMBETH.

(Before R. J. CUST, Esq., Deputy Judge.)

May 31.—Dover v. Reed.

Practice—Restoring a cause after being struck out.

The rule nisi in this case was argued to-day (vide ante, p. 593).

Mr. Ody, for the plaintiff, said there was no provision in the rules of practice directly applicable to this case, and he was therefore compelled to fall back on analogy. The cause had been struck out in consequence of the non-appearance of the plaintiff on the day of hearing. If the cause had been heard, an aggrieved party would, with leave of the Court, have been entitled to a new trial. There had not been a hearing of the case, but there had been an order for costs because of plaintiff's absence on the appointed day. That order had all the effect of a judgment, so far as costs were concerned and, in the absence of any provision in the rules to the contrary, ought to be treated as a judgment. If the Court took that view of the matter, the case might be re-opened in the same way as if a judgment had been given and a new trial granted.

Mr. Pope, for the defendant, would not offer any opposition to the application, except to ask that any order for restoring the cause should be accompanied by a condition that the costs on the former occasion and of to-day should be paid into court by the plaintiff.

Mr. CUST said he thought that was a reasonable condition, and the order would be that the cause be restored, and the 14th of June fixed for hearing, but the previous order to strike out the cause would remain if the condition as to payment of costs into court during the day were not complied with.

WEST INDIAN INCUMBERED ESTATES COURT, PARK-STREET, WESTMINSTER.

(Before Mr. FLEMING, Q.C., and Mr. CUST, Commissioners.)

April 1.—Re Plummer; Ex parte Symes.

St. Christopher—Statute of Limitations—Reversionary interest—Sale by Provost Marshal.

Under the local statute No. 201 of 1863 a mortgage of a reversionary interest is not barred until twenty years after the reversion has fallen into possession.

Under the local statute No. 37 of 1837 the Provost Marshal has no power to sell an equitable interest in money secured by mortgage.

This was a petition for the distribution of a sum of £866 4s. 1d., part of the proceeds of the sale of the Belvedere Estate, in the island of St. Christopher, which had been carried to a separate account.

It appeared that by a family settlement made in 1840, a sum of upwards of £4,200 (which was the sum in respect of which the fund in court had been allotted) was assigned to trustees, upon trust to pay the interest to Emily Foster Haydon for her life, and after her death upon trust to divide the principal between her two sons, Vaughan Haydon and Dolbeare Haydon in equal shares.

In 1843, Vaughan Haydon and Dolbeare Haydon mortgaged their reversionary interest in the fund to John Francis to secure £120 with interest at five per cent.

Vaughan Haydon died in 1853, intestate, leaving his mother, Emily Foster Haydon, and his brother, Dolbeare Haydon, his sole next of kin. Dolbeare Haydon died in 1862, having by his will bequeathed all his personal estate to his mother, who died in 1863, having by her will bequeathed the residue of her personal estate to parties who were represented by the present petitioner.

It appeared therefore that the fund in court was applicable first to the discharge of Francis's mortgage, and, subject thereto, was payable to the legatees of Emily Foster Haydon.

It was, however, objected by the legatees that as no interest had been paid on Francis's mortgage for more than twenty years, the mortgage was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and in addition to this objection a claim was made by F. S. Wigley and A. P. Burt to a moiety of the fund by virtue of a bill of sale under the hand and seal of the Provost Marshal of the Island of St. Christopher, in 1855, whereby, after reciting a judgment obtained against Vaughan Haydon in the Island Court of Queen's Bench, upon which execution had issued, and had been duly levied upon all the right, title and interest of the said Vaughan Haydon in and to the Belvedere Estate, and that the said estate had been sold by auction to Wigley and Burt—the Provost—in exercise of the authority vested in him, and in consideration of the sum of £6, granted, bargained, and sold to Wigley and Burt, their heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and interest of the said Vaughan Haydon in and to the estate.

It was contended on behalf of Wigley and Burt that under the above bill of sale all the interest, present and future, of Vaughan Haydon in the mortgage debt of £4,268 6s. 8d., being all his interest in the Belvedere Estate, passed to the purchaser, and that, subject to Francis's mortgage, if the same were still subsisting, Wigley and Burt were entitled to a moiety of the fund. It was, however, objected on behalf of the legatees of Emily Foster Haydon that a mortgage debt was not such an interest as would pass under the description contained in the bill of sale, and that even if it were so the bill of sale was void, and ultra vires so far as it affected to deal with an equitable interest such as the interest in question. The Provost Marshal's authority was created by the local statute No. 37, dated the 13th of April, 1837, which prescribed minutely the mode in which execution should be levied, and neither the terms of the will nor the directions of the statute were applicable to the seizure and sale of such an interest as the present one, which was a mere reversionary interest in a portion of a mortgage debt, itself subject to a mortgage. Such an interest could not have been seized by the sheriff under an English judgment, and a judgment in St. Christopher must be taken to have the same legal effect as a judgment in England, except so far as it might be affected by the local statutes.

The cases of Doe v. Greenhill, 4 B. & Ald. 684; and Scott v. Scholey, 8 East, 466, were referred to on this point.

Peck, for the petitioners, contended that Francis's mortgage was barred by the 37th section of the local statute No. 201, passed in 1863, which provided that "all actions upon any indenture, bond or other instrument under seal shall be commenced and sued within twenty years after the right of action accrued and not after."

G. Rochfort Clarke, for Francis, the mortgagee.

Archibald Smith, for Wigley and Burt, contended that whatever might be the law of England as to judgments, it was the universal understanding and belief throughout the West Indies that an assignment by the Provost Marshal was sufficient to pass whatever interest the debtor had, whether legal or equitable, and that the description in the bill of sale was an apt and sufficient description of the interest then possessed by Vaughan Haydon in the Belvedere Estate.

The COMMISSIONERS were of opinion that in the case of the mortgage of a reversionary interest, the right of action could not be considered to have accrued so far as regarded the fund subject to the mortgage until the reversion fell into possession, and that, therefore, the mortgagee was not barred.

As to the claim of Wigley and Burt, they were of opinion that the interest of Vaughan Haydon was not such an interest as could be seized or sold by the Provost Marshal under the provisions of the Colonial Act, and that the bill of sale was irregular and void.

The claim of Francis, the mortgagee, was, therefore, admitted; and the claim of Wigley and Burt was disallowed; but the costs of all parties were ordered to be paid out of the fund.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. JOHN BALGUY, barrister-at-law, of the Midland Circuit, has been appointed Stipendiary Magistrate for the Potteries district of Staffordshire, in succession to Mr. J. E. Davis, who has been nominated stipendiary magistrate of Sheffield. Mr. Balguy is the eldest son of the late John Balguy, Esq., Q.C. (Recorder of Derby, Commissioner of Bankrupts for the Birmingham district, and Chairman of the Derbyshire Quarter Sessions), by Barbara, daughter of the Rev. J. Fleming St. John, Frebendary of Worcester. He was born in 1821, and was educated at Eton, and afterwards at Merton College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1844. He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in May, 1848, and soon after joined the Midland Circuit, attending also the Warwick and Coventry sessions. On the death of his father, in 1858, he succeeded to the Duffield-park estate, near Derby, and was shortly afterwards appointed a magistrate for the county. He only awaits being placed on the Commission of the Peace for Staffordshire to enter upon his duties as stipendiary magistrate.

Sir GEORGE YOUNG, Bart., barrister-at-law, has been appointed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, President of a Commission ordered to proceed to Demerara to inquire into the alleged ill-treatment of the Coolies. Sir George is the eldest son of the late Sir George Young, the second baronet, by Susan, only daughter of the late William Mackworth Praed, Esq., serjeant-at-law. He was born in 1837, and succeeded to the title on the death of his father, in 1848. The family seat is at Formosa Island on the Thames, between Cookham and Maidenhead. Sir George Young was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a scholarship and graduated B.A. (second class in classics) in 1860. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in April, 1864, and has practised as an equity draughtsman and conveyancer.

Mr. ISAMBARD BRUNEL, barrister-at-law, has been appointed by the Lord Bishop of Ely to be Chancellor of that diocese. Mr. Brunel was educated at Balliol College, where he graduated B.A. in 1860. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in January, 1863.

Mr. WILLIAM FRANCIS, deputy clerk of the peace for Middlesex, has been appointed Clerk to the Court of General Assessment Sessions, constituted under the provisions of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 67, for the purpose of regulating the assessment of the metropolis.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS SOUTHGATE, solicitor, of Gravesend, has been appointed Clerk to the Gravesend Board of Guardians, and Superintendent-Registrar of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, in succession to his father, the late Mr. F. Southgate, who had held the office for thirty-five years.

Mr. GEORGE FRENCH MANT, of Storrington, Sussex, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

Mr. EDMUND ATKINSON GAUNDY, of Bankfield, Bury, Lancaster, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE BILL.

Sir,—The plan suggested by the judges in their first resolution, viz., "that in order to prevent confusion in the future administration of justice, a careful collation of the common law and equity law having been first made, express provision should be made as to what the law should be in each particular instance," is evidently the plan of which every one of us would approve, if only it could be carried into effect. The judges, however, themselves doubt of its possibility, and that it cannot be done by Parliament is quite clear, Parliament having neither the patience nor the learning necessary for the purpose; but it is not quite so clear, I think, that it may not be done in an altered way by the judges themselves; that is, by the common law and Chancery judges being together commissioned, say for a year or two years, to publish decrees or edicts from time to time stating exactly what the law on the various conflicting points would in future be.

The late Mr. Austin was of opinion that it would be infinitely better that the judicial body should be expressly empowered to innovate upon the law directly and openly rather than indirectly and covertly by judgments, which perhaps were sometimes given without due deliberation. However this may be in general it is not necessary now to determine, but here, and now that we have a special work to perform in harmonising existing well-known distinctions between the two systems of law and equity, the case seems to admit of, and indeed calls for, a special remedy, and I believe to no tribunal or committee or commission would the public entrust this matter with the same confidence that they would to the bench of judges sitting as I have proposed.

OBITUARY.

MR. C. H. A. MARTELLI.

Mr. Charles Henry Ansley Martelli, barrister-at-law, died at Westbourne-square, Hyde-park, on the 30th May, at the age of fifty-eight years. He was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A., in 1838. In April, 1836, he was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn; and had practised for many years at the Chancery Bar.

MR. JOHN WARD.

Mr. John Ward, solicitor, of Burslem, Staffordshire, died on the 28th May at the advanced age of eighty-nine years. He was born at Slawston, Leicestershire, in June, 1781, and after having served his articles of clerkship at Cheadle, in Staffordshire, was admitted in Hilary Term, 1808. Shortly afterwards he settled at Burslem, where he soon acquired a lucrative practice. He was clerk to the Burslem and Lawton turnpike trustees, and during his tenure of office the road from Burslem to Hanley was formed; he was also clerk to the Burslem market trustees prior to the adoption of the Public Health Act. During the Chartist riots he was selected by the Treasury to aid in the prosecution of the ringleaders at the special commission which was issued for their trial. Mr. Ward had practised uninterruptedly from the time of his admission up to the date of his death, and nearly every title to land in Burslem and Tunstall had passed through his hands. As an author he was known for his "History of Stoke-upon-Trent;" he had also published a poem called "The Potter's Art," and left other unpublished pieces. On the death of the Prince Consort, some lines composed by him "in memoriam" were presented to, and graciously accepted by, her Majesty. He was an officer of the old Langport Volunteers, and took a great interest in the revival of the volunteer movement. Mr. Ward was a member of the Incorporated Law Society, and also of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association. In 1810 he married Anne, daughter of Mr. Joseph Rice, of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, by whom he had one son, who predeceased him, and Mrs. Ward died in 1859. His funeral took place on the 3rd June, in St. Paul's Church, Burslem.

The remains of the late Mr. J. H. Boys, solicitor, of Margate, whose death we announced last week, were interred in the family vault of Betteshanger, near Eastry, on the 3rd June. Mr. Boys belonged to an old East Kentish family, being descended from Sir John Boys, Recorder of Canterbury, who founded the Jesus Hospital for boys, in that city, in 1612; and also from Colonel John Boys, who defended Donnington Castle, in Berkshire, against the Parliament soldiers in 1646, and was knighted by King Charles I. for his bravery on that occasion. The late Mr. Boys occupied a prominent position among the Masonic brotherhood, and for many years held the office of Deputy Grand Master of the province of Kent.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS AT THE FINAL EXAMINATION FOR HILARY TERM, 1870.

III.—EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

10. A court of equity grants injunctions to restrain proceedings at law for the purpose of preventing persons taking an unfair advantage of a legal claim, or for putting a stop to vexatious or oppressive litigation; injunctions to restrain proceedings at law may be perpetual or temporary, total or partial, qualified or conditional (Sm. Man. Eq. p. 386).

11. Equity does not follow the law in the case of trusts executory. A trust executory, as opposed to a trust executed, is a trust not formally and finally declared by the instrument creating it, but intended to be so declared by some future instrument (see Trevor v. Trevor, 1 P. Wms. 622; Lord Glenorchy v. Bosville, White & Tudor Lead. Cas., 1st case; Sm. Man. Eq. 15).

12. The real property in England of a deceased intestate devolves upon his heir according to the Inheritance Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, or 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, ss. 19, 20, as the case may be.

The personal property of an intestate devolves according to the Statute of Distributions, 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10, 1 Jac. 2, c. 17, or 29 Car. 2, c. 3 (Statute of Frauds), s. 25, as the case may be.

The succession to real property follows the law of the place where the property is situated.

The succession to personal property follows the law of the place where the owner was domiciled.

Whether leaseholds are governed by the lex loci rei sitæ or by the lex domicilii is doubtful, (see Jarm. on Wills, 3rd ed. vol. 1, p. 4, note (k); Vice-Chancellor Stuart in Pearman v. Twiss, 8 W. R. 329, 2 Giff. 186).

13. Contracts are governed by the law of the country where made (Story, Conflict of Laws, 6th ed., s. 76, p. 83), unless they are to be performed in another country, in which case the law of the place of performance is to govern (Ibid., s. 242, p. 305, and s. 280, p. 354, and cases there cited).

As a general rule, a contract which is void by the law of the country where it is made cannot be enforced here (Ibid., s. 243, pp. 306, 307).

14. The plaintiff files his bill against all the parties interested in disputing his title, including the Attorney-General in cases where the Crown is interested.

An answer admitting the plaintiff's title to examine the witnesses is a sufficient answer.

If a defendant puts in no answer, the Court will order the examination of the witnesses.

A motion to dismiss a bill to perpetuate testimony for want of prosecution, either before or after replication, is irregular. The proper order is that the plaintiff do proceed within a certain time, or pay the defendant his costs.

No suit for the perpetuation of testimony is set down for hearing, but when the witnesses have been examined there is an end of the cause; and any defendant, upon an affidavit that he did not examine any witnesses, may obtain an order of course for his costs; but if he examines witnesses himself he is not entitled to any costs (Cons. Ord. 9, rules 6, 7; Morgan & Chute's Chan. Acts and Ords., pp. 409, 410, and cases there cited).

The practice in suits to perpetuate testimony is not affected by the order of February 5th, 1861 (see rule 16 of that order, and Morgan & Chute's Chan. Acts and Ords., p. 625).

15. A motion for decree is one of several ways by which a suit may be brought to a hearing.

By 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 15, the plaintiff in any suit commenced by bill shall be at liberty, at any time after the time allowed to the defendant for answering the same shall have expired (but before replication) to move the Court, upon such notice as shall in that behalf be prescribed by any general order of the Lord Chancellor, for such decree or decretal order as he may think himself entitled to.

The time prescribed by General Orders is one month (Cons. Ord. 33, 4).

The motion is made before the judge to whose court the cause is attached.

IV.—BANKRUPTCY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By CHALONER W. CHUTE, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. Stockbrokers (like other persons receiving other men's moneys into their trust or custody) are traders within the new Act. Farmers and graziers are not.

2. As traders gain credit by the reputation of a business and a stock-in-trade, they are more strictly dealt with by the recent Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71) than non-traders in matters affecting such business and reputed ownership; for example, a trader departing from his dwelling-house, &c., commits an act of bankruptcy (section 7); and the 15th section (relating to reputed ownership), and section 87 (as to seizure of goods by a judgment creditor), and section 91 (as to avoidance of voluntary settlements), apply only to traders.

3. The first meeting of creditors is held for the following purposes:—

a To appoint some fit person to fill the office of trustee of the property of the bankrupt, unless they resolve to leave his appointment to the committee of inspection.

b To declare by resolution what security is to be given by the person so appointed trustee.

c To appoint some other fit persons, not exceeding five, being creditors, to form a committee of inspection for the purpose of superintending the administration by the trustee of the bankrupt's property.

d To give directions as to the manner in which the property is to be administered by the trustee (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 14).

4. A secured creditor may be a petitioning creditor, if he states his willingness to give up his security for the creditors in the event of adjudication, or if he is willing to give an estimate of the value of his security and prove for the rest.

He may vote on the choice of trustee in respect of his whole debt if he gives up his security, or in respect of the residue of his debt if he deducts the value of his security.

5. The omission to register a bill of sale makes it void as against assignees in bankruptcy (see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36). Whether the grantor be a trader or not, also, by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 15, the grantee under a bill of sale from a trader may lose his security if he leaves the goods in the possession of the bankrupt. But if a non-trader gives a bill of sale and registers it, even if the goods have not been removed before the bankruptcy, the reputed ownership clause in section 15 will not apply.

6. Moveable implements, being part of the stock-in-trade on which the trader gains his credit, would belong to the trustee, as against a mortgagee of the manufactory who left them in the order and disposition of the bankrupt (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 15, clause 5).

Fixed machinery, on the contrary, passing under the mortgage of the realty, would be included in the security of the mortgagee (see Longbottom v. Berry, 5 L. R. Q. B. 137, the latest case on the subject).

7. Demands in the nature of unliquidated damages are not proveable, unless they arise out of a contract or promise, in which case the value may be estimated (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 3).

8. Stoppage in transitu occurs when goods are consigned entirely or partly on credit from one person to another and the consignee becomes bankrupt or insolvent before the goods arrive. In this event the consignor has a right to direct the captain of the ship, or other carrier, to deliver the goods to himself or his agent instead of to the consignee, who has thus become unable to pay for them.

9. A bankrupt is guilty of a misdemeanour if he does not make a true discovery of his property, or does not deliver up his assets, or papers, or conceals any part thereof, or if he fails to inform the trustee of a false debt having been proved against the estate, or if he mutilates his papers, or if he obtains credit within four months of bankruptcy on false representations; and he is guilty of felony if he fraudulently absconds with his property to the amount of £20 or upwards (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, ss. 11, 12).

10. A debtor may obtain a general discharge from his debts not only by bankruptcy, but by liquidation under section 125 of the new Act, or composition with creditors under section 126.

11. An equitable mortgagee, being a creditor holding a specific security, may, on giving up his security, prove for his whole debt; or he may prove for the balance due after realising or giving credit for the value of his security (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 40).

12. On the bankruptcy of a firm, dividends of the joint and separate properties are to be declared together; the joint creditors being paid out of the joint estate, and separate creditors out of the separate estates (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 104).

13. The landlord of a bankrupt may distrain for rent due; but if he levies such distress after the commencement of the bankruptcy, it will be available only for one year's rent previous to the order for adjudication, and the overplus may be proved for under the bankruptcy (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 34).

14. The act of bankruptcy upon which the adjudication is founded must have occurred within six months before the presentation of the petition (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 6).

15. The recent Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) provides (section 23) that the trustee may, by writing, disclaim onerous property, and upon such disclaimer the property, if a contract, shall be deemed to have determined from the date of the order of adjudication, and, if a lease, to have been surrendered on the same date.

V.—CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES.

1. It is a misdemeanour under section 39 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, and is punishable by imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour, and if a male under the age of seventeen years, with or without whipping.

2. No. By section 58 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, the statute which deals with "malicious injuries to property," "every punishment and forfeiture by this Act imposed on any person maliciously committing any offence, whether the same be punishable upon indictment or upon summary conviction, shall equally apply and be enforced whether the offence shall be committed from malice conceived against the owner of the property in respect of what it shall be committed, or otherwise."

3. The rule is that every person must be taken to intend the necessary and probable consequences of his own acts.

4. A principal in the first degree is one who is the actor or actual perpetrator of the fact.

5. Married women are not liable for their criminal acts when done under the coercion of their husbands; and if the acts are done in the presence of their husbands it is assumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the acts are done by the husband's coercion. Evidence may be given to show that a wife, although acting in her husband's presence, was not, in fact, acting under coercion, and if this is proved she is liable as if a feme sole. The mere authority or command of a husband to his wife to commit a crime will not excuse her if she commits it in his absence. It is not very well settled to what crimes this partial immunity of married women from criminal liability extends. It is said not to extend to treason, murder, or manslaughter, but it seems that it does extend to theft and burglary.

6. This has been held not to be larceny—Reg. v. Willis (1 Moo. C. C. 375)—as the husband had a joint property in the goods stolen. The principle of this decision may possibly, however, be affected by the late statute, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, by which one of two or more beneficial owners of money or goods converting the money or goods to his own use may be dealt with as if he was not one of such beneficial owners.

7. Compounding a mere charge of felony is illegal, as where a person having charged a man before a magistrate with embezzlement agrees not to prosecute the charge in consideration of a bill of exchange being accepted by another person.

8. It was laid down in McNaghten's case (10 Cl. & Fin. 209) that to establish a defence on the ground of insanity it must be shown that the accused was "labouring under such a defect of reason from disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or if he did know it, that he did not know that he was doing wrong;" or where the accused is under a delusion as to the existence of supposed facts, that such facts so supposed by him to exist would have justified him if they had really existed.

9. Murder is unlawfully killing with malice aforethought. Manslaughter is unlawfully killing without malice aforethought.

10. At common law burglary is the breaking and entering of the dwelling-house of another in the night-time with intent to commit a felony therein; and by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 26, s. 51, the breaking out of the dwelling-house of another in the night, having entered it with intent to commit a felony, or having committed a felony while in it, is burglary.

11. Yes. By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 27, "every instrument liable to stamp duty shall be admitted in evidence in any criminal proceedings, although it may not have the stamp required by law impressed thereon or affixed thereto."

12. This is not capable of direct proof, and the jury must therefore infer the guilty knowledge from surrounding circumstances. On an indictment for uttering a forged bank note proof may be given that the accused uttered other forged notes, or that when he uttered the notes in question that he gave a false name or a false address, or that he then had other forged notes in his possession.

13. By section 2 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously set fire to any dwelling-house, any person being therein, shall be guilty of felony and shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude for life or for any term not less than five years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement, and if a male under sixteen years of age, with or without whipping. By section 3 whoever shall unlawfully and maliciously set fire to any house, stable, &c., &c., &c., with intent thereby to injure or defraud any person shall be liable to the same punishment as mentioned in section 2.

14. The false representation need not be in words; the conduct and acts of the accused may be sufficient without any verbal representation. The representation must be of some existing fact. A statement as to some future event is not sufficient. Therefore a promise to do an act at a future time is not a false pretence, although the person so promising had no intention of doing as he promised. The offence is completed by obtaining the money or goods.

15. The receipt of stolen goods is punishable when the receiver knows at the time that he receives the goods that they are stolen goods, whether the stealing amounts to a felony or only to a misdemeanour.

EXAMINATION AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

I.—FROM CHITTY ON CONTRACTS.

1. What are the requisites of a deed to make it complete as such?
2. Explain the principal differences between specialties and simple contracts.
3. What is the distinction between good and valuable considerations, and what is their respective efficacy to support deeds and simple contracts respectively?
4. Mention exceptions to the rule that a contract requires mutuality of obligation to render it binding on either party.
5. When is it necessary that a simple contract should be in writing?
6. What is the effect, as regards the liability of a surety, if either the person whose fidelity is guaranteed, or the person to whom the guarantee is given, take a partner: the transaction in respect of which the guarantee is given being continued by or with the firm?
7. What is the effect, as regards the liability of a surety, of any dealing by the creditor with the liability of the principal debtor; and if the creditor gives time for payment to the principal debtor, is it material whether he does it under a binding engagement to do so, or through gratuitous forbearance?

II.—FROM WILLIAMS ON THE PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

8. What is an estate pur autre vie?
9. A is tenant for life of real estate under a settlement dated 1860. The settlement contains no power of leasing. Can the tenant for life grant a binding lease other than for his own life, and if so, for what term, and subject to what conditions?
10. What words are sufficient to create an estate tail?
11. A conveyance is made to A. B. and his heirs, to the use of A. B. and his heirs, in trust for C. D. and his heirs. Does the legal estate vest in A. B. or C. D.?
12. A., by will, gives £5,000 to his son B. B. dies in his father's lifetime leaving a child. Will the legacy lapse?

13. If a testator devise land to his heir-at-law, will such heir-at-law take by descent or purchase?

14. May a tenant in tail commit waste without first barring the entail?

III.—FROM J. W. SMITH'S MANUAL OF EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE.

15. State some of the circumstances which have been considered by the Court as evidence that a deed purporting to be an absolute conveyance for value was intended merely by way of security.

16. State the general law, as to the application of payments made by a debtor to his creditor.

17. Where money is bequeathed to charitable purposes abroad, in what cases will the Court of Chancery secure the fund, and cause the charity to be administered under its direction, and in what cases will the Court not do so?

18. Where a specific legacy is given to one for life, and after his death to another, under what circumstances can the legatee in remainder obtain a decree for security from the tenant for life, for the delivery over of the legacy; and in the absence of those circumstances, to what is the remainderman entitled, and for what purpose?

19. Where a contract, which ought to be in writing, has not been reduced into writing, in what case, and for what reason, will the Court not allow the Statute of Frauds to be set up as a protection against such contract?

20. Under what circumstances, and by what method, can a mortgagee convert interest into principal so as to affect the mortgaged estate, and what will be the effect of such conversion on subsequent incumbrances, of which the mortgagee had notice?

21. In what case will the Court of Chancery, at the instance of persons having limited or ulterior interests in real estate, direct the title deeds to be secured or brought into Court for preservation?

IV.—BOOK KEEPING.

22. Give a specimen of an account current between A. and B. (rendered by B.) consisting of five items on each side, and showing a balance in favour of B.

23. What books are necessary for an ordinary tradesman's accounts?

24. Describe the uses of the books mentioned in the answer to the previous question.

25. What are the meanings of the terms "debit" and "credit," and on which side of the account should entries under those respective headings be placed?

26. State an account between a wholesale house, and a tradesman, showing goods sold, goods returned, and acceptances given by the tradesman; some being paid, and some returned dishonoured with expenses.

ADMISSION OF ATTORNEYS.

TRINITY TERM, 1870.

COURT PAPERS.

QUEEN'S BENCH.

This Court will on Friday the 17th, Saturday the 18th, Monday the 20th, Tuesday the 21st, Tuesday the 28th, Wednesday the 29th, and Thursday the 30th days of June instant, hold sittings, and will proceed in disposing of the cases in the New Trial, Special, and Crown Papers, and any other matters then pending, and will give judgment in cases standing for judgment, and will also hold a sitting on Wednesday, the 6th day of July next, for the purpose of giving judgments only.

THE NEW LEGAL PEER.

The Right Hon. Thomas O'Hagan, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, has been created a peer, under the title of Baron O'Hagan. His Lordship, who is in his sixtieth year, was called to the bar in Ireland in Hilary Term, 1836, and was appointed a Queen's Counsel in February, 1849. He was for several years assistant-barrister for the county of Longford, and was elected a bencher of King's Inns, Dublin, in 1859. In February, 1860, he was appointed Solicitor-General for Ireland, when Mr. Rickard Deasy became Attorney-General, and in February, 1861, on Mr. Deasy being appointed a baron of the Court of Exchequer, Mr. O'Hagan succeeded him as Attorney-General, and was then sworn in a member of the Irish Privy Council. In May, 1863, he was elected M.P. for Tralee, in succession to Captain Daniel O'Connell, who retired on being appointed a special commissioner of income-tax, and continued to represent that borough till February, 1866, when he was appointed fourth justice of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland. In November, 1868, on the formation of Mr. Gladstone's Government, he was selected to fill the post of Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, of which office he is still the incumbent. Since the beginning of the present century, the following Lord Chancellors of Ireland have also been created peers of Parliament:—Lord Redesdale, 1802—6; Lord Manners 1807—27; Lord Plunkett, 1830—4 and 1835—41; and Lord Campbell, 1841 (afterwards Lord Chancellor of England). Lord St. Leonards, who was Lord Chancellor of Ireland from 1841—46, was not created a peer till he became Lord Chancellor of England in 1852.

COURT FEES.—The fees received in stamps in the superior Courts of Common Law in the year ending the 31st of March, 1870, amounted to £91,698, being £2,499 less than in the preceding year. The decrease was chiefly in the Court of Queen's Bench; in the Exchequer there was an increase. The salaries, pensions, and expenses charged on the fee fund amounted to £98,043, leaving a deficiency of £6,445. The fees received in the Court of Probate and Divorce in the year amounted to £134,070; the payments for compensations (a decreasing account), salaries, &c., amounted to £189,078, so that there was a deficiency of £55,008. In the Admiralty Court the fees received produced £8,446, but the payments charged on the fund reached £16,084, leaving a deficiency of £7,638. In the Land Registry the year's fees were £1,280, but the payments were £5,684, leaving a deficiency of £4,404. The total excess of expenditure over receipts in respect of the Courts of Probate and Admiralty and the Land Registry (exclusive of the salaries of the judges) was therefore £67,050.—Times.

NEW COUNTY COURT RULES AND ORDERS.

THE DEBTORS ACT, 1869.

RULES AND FORMS for Regulating the Proceedings in the County Courts.—May, 1870.

We, George Lake Russell, John Bury Dasent, John Worledge, Rupert Alfred Kettle, and William Furner, being judges of county courts appointed to frame rules and orders for regulating the practice of the courts and forms of proceedings therein, under the 32nd section of "The County Courts Act, 1856," have, under the powers vested in us by the said Act and by "The Debtors' Act, 1869," framed the following rules and forms, and we do hereby certify the same to the Lord Chancellor accordingly.

1. The rules made under the Debtors Act, 1869, for regulating the practice of the county courts under that Act, and which came into force in all county courts on the 1st January, 1870, may be cited as "The Debtors Act Rules, 1870;" and these rules may be cited as "The Debtors Act Rules, May, 1870."

2. Rules 21, 22, 23, and 24 of the "Debtors Act Rules, January, 1870," shall be, and they are hereby, rescinded.

3. The districts of the courts referred to in section 3 of the County Courts Act, 1867, shall be deemed to be one district, so far as relates to the issuing of judgment summonses by the court in which action was brought.

4. All costs incurred by the plaintiff in endeavouring to enforce an order or judgment shall be deemed to be due in pursuance of such order or judgment under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

5. Where a judgment debtor shall upon the return day of a judgment summons satisfy the Court that he has been adjudicated a bankrupt, and that the debt was provable in the bankruptcy, or that, in respect of the debt, the 125th or 126th section of the Bankrupt Act, 1869, have been complied with, no order of commitment shall be made.

6. Where a judgment debtor shall, after the making of an order of commitment against him and before its issue, file, in the court in which the order was made, an affidavit according to the form in the schedule, stating that he has been adjudicated a bankrupt, and that the debt was provable in the bankruptcy, or that in respect of the judgment debt the provisions of either of the before-mentioned sections of the Bankrupt Act, 1869, have been complied with, and at the same time give notice to the judgment creditor of the filing of the affidavit, no such order shall issue.

7. Where a judgment debtor is arrested, he may, according to the tenor of the order of commitment, file in the county court within the district of which he is in custody, an affidavit as mentioned in the last foregoing rule, and give the notice to the judgment creditor thereof, as therein required, and thereupon the judgment debtor shall be discharged out of custody upon the certificate of the registrar of that court.

8. The forms in the annexed schedule shall be used, instead of the corresponding forms now in use.

COMMON LAW AND EQUITABLE JURISDICTION.

RULES, ORDERS and FORMS for Regulating the Practice of the County Courts.—May, 1870.

We, George Lake Russell, John Bury Dasant, John Worlledge, Rupert Alfred Kettle, and William Furner, being judges of county courts appointed to frame rules and orders for regulating the practice of the courts, and forms of proceedings therein, under the 32nd section of "The County Courts Act, 1856," have, under the powers vested in us by the said Act, and by "The County Courts Act, 1865," and "The County Courts Act, 1867," framed the following rules, orders and forms, and we do hereby certify the same to the Lord Chancellor accordingly.

1. The rules of practice which came into force in all county courts on the 1st day of January, 1868, and are now in force in such courts, may be cited as "The County Court Rules, 1868," and these rules may be cited as "The County Court Rules, 1870."

2. Process shall not be issued for service or execution unless the party at whose instance it is required to be issued shall give the Christian name and surname, description and residence, or place of business of himself, and the surname, and, if known, the Christian name and description, and also the residence of the party upon whom it is to be served, together with the name of the street and number of the house, if known, in which the party resides or carries on business; and every warrant shall have on it the name, address and description of the plaintiff and defendant.

3. Upon transmission of the plaint note, with a request and a receipt (duly stamped where necessary) by a party to whose credit money has been paid into a court, other than the court within the district of which such party resides or carries on business, the registrar of the court into which the money has been paid shall transmit such money to such party by registered post letter, enclosing a post-office order less the cost of remittance, and such remittance shall be at the risk of the said party.

4. Where a person desires to enter a plaint in a court within the district of which he does not reside, he may, instead of attending in person or by agent at the court, transmit, free of cost, to the registrar, the following:—

(1.) Statement showing the name, address and description of the plaintiff and defendants, the cause of action and the amount claimed, and, where the claim exceeds 40s., as many copies of the statement of the particulars or cause of action as there are defendants, and an additional copy to file.

(2.) A post-office order for the fees payable upon the entry of the plaint.

(3.) An envelope addressed to himself, with a penny postage stamp thereon.

And upon the receipt of the above the registrar shall enter the plaint and forward the plaint note to the plaintiff in the addressed envelope.

5. For the purpose of the two foregoing rules the several districts of the metropolitan courts shall be considered inter se as one district only.

6. The letter, form No. 6 to the County Court Rules, 1868, need not be transmitted with a summons sent for service from one metropolitan court to another.

7. Where by an affidavit of service of a summons made by the bailiff of a foreign court it shall appear doubtful whether the service will be held sufficient, the registrar of the home court shall forthwith, on receiving such affidavit, send to the plaintiff a notice according to form (No. 10) in the schedule to the County Court Rules, 1868.

8. Where a defendant pays money into court in part payment of the amount claimed, or in order that he may plead the defence of a tender, the money shall not be paid out until after the return day, and then if any costs shall have been awarded to the defendant such costs shall be deducted therefrom and be paid to the defendant.

Fees under section 2 of the Act of 1867.

9. The fee of 1s. for service of a summons issued under section 2 of the County Courts Act, 1867, and the fee of 1s. for affidavit of the service, where the amount claimed exceeds 40s., shall be paid by the plaintiff to the registrar at the time of the entry of the plaint in respect of each defendant to be served, and where the summons is to be served in a foreign district be accounted for to the treasurer, who will allow to the registrar such affidavit fees as he may have repaid to plaintiffs, in cases where the summonses have not been served.

10. The high bailiff is entitled to 1s. for endeavouring to serve the summons, even should he not succeed.

11. The amount claimed is to be inserted in the letter sent to the high bailiff of the foreign court with the summons for service, according to the form in the schedule.

12. The affidavit of service of a summons under section 2 of the County Courts Act, 1867, shall be according to the form in the schedule.

Attorney's costs.

13. Costs in plaints for the recovery of tenements and in actions of replevin may, where the fees of court are paid on £5 or upwards, be allowed to attorneys upon the scale applicable to actions on contract where the amount claimed exceeds £20, if the judge shall so order.

14. In actions of tort where the damages claimed exceed £20, the plaintiff, if successful, shall, if the judge shall so order, be entitled to recover costs, according to the scale relating to actions of tort above £20, although less than £20 be recovered, and the defendant, if successful, and the judge shall so order, shall in all such cases be entitled to recover costs according to the said scale.

15. No costs shall be allowed to an attorney in actions under section 2 of the County Courts Act, 1867, unless the particulars of the plaintiff's demand be signed by such attorney; nor shall the total costs be allowed to an attorney in actions under this section, where the sum claimed exceeds 40s., and does not exceed £5, be more than 5s., for all or any of the following acts: viz., preparing affidavit, swearing and filing, notice of mode of payment, copy and service of summons, affidavit of service with copy of summons annexed, attending to file, and entering up judgment by default.

EQUITY.

Order XX.

Rule 10. Where legacy or succession duty payable, it must be paid before execution of the decrees.] Before executing any decree or order directing the payment or transfer of any fund, or part of any fund, in respect of which any duty shall be payable to the revenue under the Acts relating to legacy or succession duty, the registrar shall, before making the payment, require a certificate from the proper officer of the payment of the duty chargeable in respect of such fund, or any part thereof respectively.

Order XXIII.

Fees on Service.

Rule 28.] The fee for service of process shall be taken in respect of each defendant to be served, and where the process is to be served in a foreign district, a fee for each affidavit of service.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

At the Court at Windsor, the 18th day of May, 1868.

Present:—

The Queen's most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas by "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860," it is enacted that it shall be lawful for her Majesty, from time to time, by an Order in Council, to direct that all or any part of the provisions of the said Act shall apply to all or any court or courts of record in England and Wales, and that within one month after such order shall have been made and published in the London Gazette, such provision shall extend and apply in manner directed by such Order, and that any such order may be, in like manner, from time to time altered and annulled; and that in and by such order her Majesty may direct by whom any powers or duties incident to the provisions applied under the said Act shall and may be exercised with respect to matters in such court or courts, and may make any orders or regulations which may be deemed requisite for carrying into operation in such court or courts the provisions so applied:

And whereas it has seemed fit to her Majesty, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, that certain of the provisions of the said Act should be extended and applied to all the courts of record established under the provisions of "The County Courts Act, 1846," and also to the City of London Court of Record as constituted by "The County Courts Acts, 1867,"

Now, therefore, her Majesty, by and with the advice aforesaid, is pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the provisions contained in sections 28, 29, 30, and 31, of "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860," shall apply to the said courts of record.

And her Majesty is further pleased, by and with the advice aforesaid, to direct that the powers and duties incident to the above-mentioned provisions of "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860," with respect to matters in the said courts of record, shall and may be exercised by the judges of the said courts respectively, or their respective deputies, and to order that the statutes, rules of practice, orders, and forms in force and used in the said courts of record shall be adopted with reference to proceedings had in such courts under the above-mentioned provisions of "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860," so far as the same are applicable mutatis mutandis.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACT, 1860.

(23 & 24 Vict. c. 126.)

Sections referred to in the foregoing Order in Council.

Section 28. Judge may refuse to interfere in proceedings to attach debts.] In proceedings to obtain an attachment of debts under "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," the judge may, in his discretion, refuse to interfere, where, from the smallness of the amount to be recovered, or of the debt sought to be attached, or otherwise, the remedy sought would be worthless or vexatious.

Section 29. Proceedings where third person has a lien on the debt.] Whenever in proceedings to obtain an attachment of debts, under the Act above mentioned, it is suggested by the garnishee that the debt sought to be attached belongs to some third person who has a lien or charge upon it, the judge may order such third person to appear before him, and state the nature and particulars of his claim upon such debt.

Section 30. Judge may bar claim of third person and make orders. After hearing the allegations of such third person under such order, and of any other person whom by the same or any subsequent order the judge may think fit to call before him, or in case of such third person not appearing before him upon such summons, the judge may order execution to issue to levy the amount due from such garnishee, or the judgment-creditor to proceed against the garnishee according to the provisions of "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," and he may bar the claim of such third person, or make such other order as he shall think fit, upon such terms, in all cases, with respect to the lien or charge (if any) of such third person, and to costs as he shall think just and reasonable.

Section 31. Provisions of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, to apply to orders. The provisions of "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," so far as they are applicable, shall apply to any order, and the proceedings thereon made and taken in pursuance of the herein next before-mentioned powers under this Act.

THE USE OF THE GOWN.

We learn from the Times that the Bishop of Manchester, Dr. Fraser, has been asked by one of his clergy for his authoritative opinion on the following questions:—1, Flowers on the Lord's Table, as part of the decorations of the great festivals; 2, the publication of banns of marriage after the second lesson at morning prayer; 3, the use of the academical or other gown for preaching. His Lordship observes that no statement of his could be "authoritative" in the sense of being legally enforceable or obligatory, unless it could be shown to rest upon some express, declared sanction of the law. Where the law was silent or ambiguous the authority of a bishop was simply moral, only binding on the laity so far as they have respect for the bishop's office, and upon the clergy so far as they recognise in each particular exercise of it one of those "godly judgments and admonitions" which, at their ordination, they promised to "follow with glad mind and will." With reference to the use of flowers, his lordship refers to Sir R. Phillimore's judgment in Elphinstone v. Purchas, and holds that, under the existing interpretation of the law, flowers on the Lord's Table at the great festivals, and it might be assumed at other seasons, is legal. Legality, however, is one thing; expediency another. In reference to the third question—the other being a very important one—his Lordship observes that he does not believe there is any authority beyond that of custom for the use of "the academical or other gown" in any ministrations or service of the Church. If Sir R. Phillimore's view of the law was correct, and it was authoritative until reversed, the surplice was the only lawful—i.e., the only prescribed—garment for the minister in all services, except when officiating at the Holy Communion. His Lordship also holds that the gown, even for preaching the sermon after evening prayer, was not a vestment that had the sanction of any direct written law, but at the same time he observes—"I would wish it to be remembered that in these indifferent things, especially when the law is not perfectly clear, the great maxim 'mos pro lege' holds, and that it would be a most unwise, indeed scarcely a justifiable step in a minister to thrust a change of this kind upon an unwilling congregation. 'Let all things be done decently and in order' is a great maxim; but 'Let all things be done unto edifying' is a greater; and the end of all our ministrations is to win our people's hearts, not to alienate them; to build up, not to disunite or destroy. At the same time I deeply deplore that to the 'decent and comely surplice' there should be got attached, even in a single mind, that it is the symbol of a party. I cannot conceive how such a suspicion could have arisen, unless the change was very intemperately introduced, or was accompanied or followed by practices of a more equivocal nature, which might seem to indicate ulterior aims." After speaking of the reason that it is inconvenient to change as being satisfactory, he expresses his belief that the congregations as a body, if consulted, would acquiesce in any change by which it could be shown that the reverence, heartiness, and decency of such service could be increased. But in cases where perhaps their patience had been somewhat severely tried, where their wishes had not been ascertained, and where it was even alleged that they had neither voice nor will in the matter, it was not surprising that they should resent or be alarmed at changes which seem to be capricious, and of which they can neither estimate the extent, or the design, or the end. The surprise, in truth, would be if it were otherwise. Change merely for the sake of change was always undesirable, but change for the sake of greater decency and order in common worship had in that aim its justification, and the minister who made it, if he was sure of the acquiescence of his congregation, might fairly ask for the sanction of his bishop, even if the change did not come within the written letter of the law. Where the law was plain and direct, and the matter was of primary importance, there was, of course, no alternative but to abide by such law, whether they liked it or not; but where there was an indistinctness or doubtful interpretation, a permissible latitude, there the course marked out for both bishop and minister was that implied in the governing principle, "Salus populi suprema lex." In a postscript, his Lordship observes that there are those who differ from him as to the use of the gown, and adds that it were much to be wished, in the interests of peace, that the question should be settled in some amicable suit. To the decision of a competent tribunal, before which the question should have been fully argued, all parties, he imagined, would be prepared to bow, and the idea of either vestment being a party symbol would no longer trouble men's minds.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The foreign market has been very active this week, and partly in consequence of this, Consols have been dull. The railway market has also receded, it is believed, however, merely on realisations by speculators, and there are symptoms of recovery. There are some new American railway loans which invite English capital, but investors naturally are shy of placing their money within the possibility of manipulation by combinations like those of the Erie "Ring."

The annual dinner of the Law Students' Debating Society will take place in July, somewhere in the country.

Mr. Thomas Ewing Winslow, lately one of the Commissioners in Bankruptcy, is about to resume practice at the bar.

The local bar and solicitors of Bristol have presented an address of condolence to Mr. E. J. Lloyd, Q.C., father of Mr. Edward Lloyd, who was murdered by Greek brigands.

We understand that the University of Oxford intend conferring an honorary degree on J. T. Bale, Esq., Q.C., LL.D., M.P., for Trinity College Dublin.

General Sir George Pollock, G.C.B., who has just been created a Field Marshal, is a younger brother of the Right Hon. Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart., late Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, and of the late Sir David Pollock, who died while Chief Justice of Bombay. Sir Frederick Pollock is eighty-seven years of age, and Sir George Pollock is eighty-four.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.—From returns made to our Parliament it appears that two kindred though distinct matters, which have long been on an unsatisfactory footing, are about to be so arranged that no one will have any reason to complain. We all know how British copyrights have been pirated in the States, and how all endeavours to come to a fair and equitable arrangement on the subject have hitherto been fruitless. This difficulty is likely to be settled, as Mr. Thornton, at Washington, has been empowered to sign a treaty on the subject, which both parties regard as satisfactory. The other matter is in reference to colonial copyrights. The law at present is, that while a copyright in the United Kingdom holds good over all the empire, the copyright of a colony takes effect only in that colony, and affords no protection to the owner either in Britain or anywhere else beyond the colony's border. This is now to be changed. A copyright in any British colony is to be regarded as Imperial as much as if taken out in London, and carries with it all the privileges in the States which a British copyright will do under the proposed convention, which, it is understood, is very much on the model of that some time ago concluded with France.—Toronto Globe.

LONDON, JUNE 18, 1870.

A CASE WHICH HAS come before Mr. Justice Willes at chambers gives rise to a very important question upon the construction of the Debtors Act, 1869. Section 4 of the Act enacts that "with the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, no person shall be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money." Certain exceptions are then enumerated, Crown debts not being among them. The case in question is that of Mr. Leonard Edmunds. His controversies with the Crown it will be remembered were referred to the arbitration of two members of the bar, and their award found that Mr. Edmunds was indebted to the Crown to the amount of several thousands of pounds. Judgment for the amount was afterwards entered up; and Mr. Edmunds had been arrested upon this judgment at the suit of the Crown. Upon an application to Mr. Justice Willes at Chambers for the discharge of the defendant out of custody, the question was argued before his Lordship whether the Act affects the right of the Crown to arrest its debtors, or whether the section applies only to the debts of subjects. The learned judge intimated an opinion that the Crown was not bound unless expressly or impliedly referred to; he, however, reserved his judgment. Whichever way he may decide, it is not likely that the parties will rest satisfied with the decision of a single judge. But we are now in the middle of June and the Courts will sit again on the 2nd of November, four months and a-half hence. We venture to hope that when the Lord Chancellor is framing the rules for the contemplated High Court of Justice he will not include among them a rule by which as is the case now, the Courts shall be closed and justice at its highest source sealed up for more than one-third of a year at a stretch.

IT REALLY SEEMS at last probable that bills for the amendment of our judicial system will become law this session. We say "bills" advisedly; because the measures now about to be sent to the Commons cannot properly be described as "the bills" which, under corresponding names, have heretofore attracted our attention. The changes, however, which have been introduced at the last moment to disarm an opposition which certainly seemed to us hypercritical, though of such a nature as materially to alter the character of the bills as bills, are not, as we think, calculated to have much practical effect upon the constitution of the new High Court of Justice. That the Court of Appeal has been made a division of the High Court instead of a separate court will not materially affect the course of business, because, as a rule, the appeals would in any event be from this or that divisional court to the Court of Appeal, and would follow exactly the same course whether the last-mentioned court be a divisional court or a separate high court; but in the cases, necessarily rare, where the High Court itself pronounces a decision, it would obviously be absurd to admit of an appeal from this Court to one of its own divisions; and therefore, we presume, though this is not expressly provided, that in such cases the only appeal will be direct to the House of Lords. It is also left in doubt whether the provision in the High Court Bill which gives an appeal to the court itself from "any divisional court" will apply to the divisional court of appeal which is constituted, not by that bill, but the Appellate Bill. By the way, it seems to us inartistic to keep the bills separate now that the court is to be single, although it was, of course, proper that two distinct bills should be introduced when the intention was to constitute two separate courts. As the bills stand at present they somewhat grotesquely provide that the High Court of Justice shall consist of five divisions (High Court of Justice Bill, s. 3) of which the divisional court of appeal shall be a sixth (Appellate Jurisdiction Bill, s. 3). The amalgamating process may perhaps be done in committee by the Commons, and will be something upon which to employ the energy of the lawyers in that House.

There are one or two verbal inaccuracies in the High Court of Justice Bill in its present shape, arising apparently from the rapidity and magnitude of the changes it has undergone: for instance, the notion of the contemplated Committee of Council has been abandoned, and the clause whereby such committee was constituted has been struck out; nevertheless in section 21 we still find a reference to a "Committee of Council constituted in manner hereinbefore mentioned," which has somehow escaped erasure.

The principal difference produced by the last set of changes is in the inevitable delay. That which has heretofore been the period of maximum delay (1st November, 1871) has now become the time of earliest possible accomplishment, for it is no longer to be possible for an order in council or any other authority to call the High Court of Justice into being as soon as its rules are ready, but an Act of Parliament must be obtained to give them life and efficacy, and they are more sanguine than we who expect to see that end accomplished within the limits of a single session. For the High Court of Justice Bill we do not regret this; we think that there is no such urgent need of legislation in that direction as should supersede the necessity of careful deliberation, but to have to wait for a satisfactory Court of Appeal until the whole new system of procedure in the courts of first instance has been settled and approved by the Legislature seems to us to be at once a substantial grievance and a patent absurdity.

OUR CONTEMPORARY the Law Journal has drawn attention to the unfortunate language of the Judges Jurisdiction Act of this session. The second section, which is that intended to confer jurisdiction on the judges of any one of the three superior courts to assist in the despatch of business in either of the other courts, begins with the words "in case," and as each of the many sentences the clauses contains is coupled to the preceding one by the copulative "and," the result is that the clause is in form hypothetical throughout, and appears to contain no positive enacting words. This result was brought about by the amendments which were adopted in the course of the passage of the bill through the Lords and Commons. As the bill stood in the first instance, the chief judge of a court requiring assistance might send a request to any judge of another court, in which case certain results were to follow. At the suggestion, we believe, of Lord Ellenborough, the Lord Chancellor altered this by substituting the chief judge of the other court as the person to whom the request was to be sent. As it then stood such chief judge was to "send" a puisne judge to the assistance of the other court. In the Commons Mr. Denman pointed out that this language was not very respectful to the puisne judges, who had never been liable to be "sent" about at the orders of their chief. The Attorney-General either adopted Mr. Denman's amendment or promised to alter the clause to meet his objection. Somehow or other the words "in case" crept in, and nonsense was made of the whole. This is as ridiculous an instance as we have ever met with of the absurdities which may be caused by the want of system with which we legislate. It seems no one's business to read an amended clause with a view of seeing even that it is good grammar, much less that it expresses what was intended. It would be a very proper penance for the person by whose fault the mistake originated, to have the trouble of framing a new clause (subject, of course, to supervision) and of publicly explaining why an amendment of the Act was required. We cannot, however, concur in the opinion of our contemporary that all acts done by a judge of one court in another under the supposed authority of the Act will be without jurisdiction. It has been laid down that bad grammar does not vitiate a deed, and although we are not aware that the same thing has ever been expressly held as to Acts of Parliament, yet it has been held that they are not to be construed so as to bring about an absurdity. Now, in the present case, no meaning at all can be given to the clause unless it is that jurisdiction is conferred by it. Any Court would, we think, be bound to hold that the Legislature have not said "in case a judge shall have jurisdiction," and have then stopped without telling us what is to be the result. It is a less forced and more reasonable construction to give no effect, or at all events not to give its ordinary meaning, to the word "and," where it occurs in the middle of the clause and after the semicolon in the printed copy. The judges would be bound to read the whole Act together, and they would find that the next section, the third, says that no evidence shall be required to found the jurisdiction of such judge. The fourth section also expressly enacts that a puisne judge of one court may assist in holding a sitting in banco of another court at the same time that other judges of that court are sitting in banco also. This, therefore, expressly provides for the only case in which the jurisdiction has as yet been exercised, which by-the-bye, is as we pointed out while the bill was under discussion, almost the only case in which the jurisdiction is likely to be exercised in practice. But further, the language of the fourth section, as well as that of the third, is only consistent with such an interpretation of the second as will make that section to confer some jurisdiction. On the whole, therefore, we cannot but think that the mistake, though one discreditable to our Legislature, and which will give the judges fair ground for declining to act extensively upon the Act, is yet one which, if the question came to be argued, the Courts would hold to be immaterial. Arguments tending to the contrary conclusion might, however, be drawn from the third section itself, for it might be said that stops and headings of sections are not to be regarded in an Act of Parliament, so that this very third section must be read as the conclusion of the former. It would certainly be curious if any court were compelled to hold that Parliament had enacted, by way of anticipation, that in case a judge should get, by certain preliminary steps, some jurisdiction which he then had not, that is to say, in case any future Act should give it to him, then no evidence should be required of one of the preliminary steps towards his getting it.

A further difficulty, however, arises as to this very third section. In enacting that no evidence shall be required of one of the preliminary steps, viz., the request, have not the Legislature, in effect, said that evidence shall be necessary of the other steps, such as the appointment of the judge by his brethren in his own court?

LEGAL EDUCATION FOR SOLICITORS.

Last week we discussed "Legal Education for the Bar," a question which it seems is now likely to receive at last some of the attention which its importance deserves. The education of the bar, however, as the bar is at present constituted, is only a branch of a still larger question. The necessity for, and the effect of, the legal education of solicitors is also of great importance and ought to receive more notice than is generally accorded to it in discussions upon legal education.

It is not difficult to see why the legal education of solicitors is so little talked about. The members of that branch of the profession are not usually known by name to the public as barristers are. Their names do not appear in the daily papers in connection with the cases in which they are in fact engaged, and the larger portion of their ordinary occupation is of a kind which, although as important to the community at large as that transacted by barristers, is not by its very nature likely to attract public observation. Besides all this solicitors all have to undergo compulsory examinations, and any discussion regarding their legal education must deal with alterations in an existing system rather than with the question whether any education at all is required.

Although these reasons may to some extent account for the apparent indifference with which the legal education of solicitors is regarded, that education is nevertheless a matter of great consequence. The total number of solicitors is larger than that of barristers, and the number of solicitors in actual practice exceeds still more the number of barristers in practice, and solicitors transact an infinitely larger amount of business than that which is dealt with by the bar. The amount of work done by solicitors will be obvious the moment we stop to consider the vast number of contracts, letters, notices, &c., &c., they have to draw and advise upon, the questions and disputes of all sorts that they have to deal with, and the immense amount of semi-legal business they have to transact. They have also the most important duty of preparing all cases submitted for the opinion of counsel, which involves not only the exercise of judgment and discretion, but also a knowledge of at least the leading principles of the branch of law which affects the question. They have also to draw the briefs, select the witnesses, inspect the documents, give notices, &c., &c., in all Nisi Prius cases, and the due performance of these duties is as important for the success of a cause as the learning and ability of the advocate who conducts it. Solicitors have besides to conduct all communications with the opposite party during a litigation, and in addition to all this they are entitled to act and do very frequently act most efficiently as advocates in many of the inferior courts, and especially in county courts, the jurisdiction of which is being constantly increased. All this requires a knowledge of law, as the greater portion of the work has to be done without any aid from the opinion of counsel, and, indeed, much has to be done on the spur of the moment when there is but little time for consideration.

We desire to urge most strongly the necessity of considering the education of solicitors as an essential part of any new scheme of legal training that claims a title to be substituted for that which already exists. Not only should due provision be made for the legal education of solicitors, but it is very important that they should have the same kind of education and training (we do not say necessarily the same degree) as that which is given to those studying for the bar. Whatever evils the present dual system of the profession may have (and it admittedly has some), they are much increased by anything which tends to create differences of opinion or sentiment with respect to the way in which the two branches of the profession regard the law. If one branch of the profession is encouraged by the tendency of their education to think that a man must be but an ignorant lawyer who has not got at his fingers' ends a large number of the most recently decided cases, and the other branch regard such knowledge as at most nothing more than the recollection of the headings of an index, it is not likely that there will be much harmony of feeling between the two branches with regard to general questions of law. Such divergences of thought tend to make the daily work of the law more difficult and therefore more tedious and expensive than it need be, and it also renders any general improvement in the law itself almost impossible. What is required is that all the members of the profession should be thoroughly familiar with the system of law with which they have to deal, and understand that system in its details, as a workman understands the use of his tools, and they should all be accustomed to regard the system in the same light, and to work it in the same way, so that by harmonious action the most efficient result may be obtained.

Mr. David Graham Barkley, who has been awarded the highest place at the recent examination of the Inns of Court, is a member of the Bengal Civil Service, which he entered by competition in 1857, standing fourth of the twelve gentlemen who were elected in that year.—Allen's Indian Mail.

The programme of the present plan for the education of solicitors sounds well, but we fear that it is not carried out as thoroughly as might be. The theoretical portion of their legal study might be much more completely taught. Most of our readers are probably familiar with the rules which regulate the admission of solicitors to the practice of their profession. There is a preliminary examination on general subjects to test the candidate's general information. Then there are at considerable intervals of time an intermediate and a final examination on subjects purely legal, except that there are some questions on book-keeping. In order to assist students to prepare for these examinations lecturers are appointed who give lectures and hold classes, attendance at which, although not compulsory, is open to all students. Besides this theoretical education provision is made for the learning of the practical details of the profession, and no one can be admitted as a solicitor who has not been articled for a certain number of years to a solicitor. This scheme of education, as we said, sounds well. There is a due admixture of practical and theoretical training. The office work to teach the former and the examination for the latter.

The practical part probably could not be taught in any other way, and is learnt, when the pupils are willing to learn, as well as such knowledge can be learnt. The other portion of the education is more faulty. The attendance on lectures is not compulsory, and there is nothing which necessarily brings the students together during their period of study, and thus a most valuable means of education is neglected. The value of bringing students together is great in all kinds of education, but it would be especially valuable to solicitors as the routine of their profession does not bring them very much into contact with one another. All barristers in practice necessarily see a great deal of one another, and in this way acquire much valuable knowledge after they have commenced the practice of the profession. Solicitors also doubtless acquire much after they are admitted, but they have not the opportunities that barristers have for doing so. It is therefore especially desirable that they should be brought into contact with one another before they commence practice. The present plan of requiring merely that candidates shall pass a couple of examinations, for which they may prepare themselves as they please, also tends to encourage the habit of "cram," a result which should be most carefully guarded against. This last evil might to a great extent be remedied by a careful method of examination which should thoroughly test the legal acquirements of each candidate. If we may judge by the published questions, however, the examinations are very carelessly conducted, and the questions to be answered are framed in a way which seems to show more regard for the time of the examiners than desire to test the knowledge of the students. For instance, at the last final examination for Trinity Term, out of fifteen questions on criminal law two were as to the amount of punishment which might be inflicted for specified crimes. It is not easy to imagine a more thoroughly useless and objectionable kind of question.

To improve the questions that are asked at these examinations would not be difficult. It would but require care and attention on the part of the examiners and the bestowal of more time in the preparation of the questions. The other objection to the present system might be obviated to a great extent by bringing students together by a more complete plan of library and other similar accommodation, if not, by making attendance on lectures compulsory. It might also perhaps be useful if tutors were appointed to whom the students could refer for advice and general assistance in their studies. Such help as this is most valuable to a student who often does not know what are the best books to read and in what order subjects should be studied. Perhaps also, as we suggested last week, the old system of "moots" might be revived in some form or other. However, we do not pretend in this article to suggest any complete plan of legal education. We only throw out these remarks as suggestions which may be worth consideration.

We hope that the subject of legal education will not be again forgotten until some real improvement has been made. The question is one which is doubtless necessarily technical in its details, and its advantages are not always clearly apparent at a cursory glance. A very slight acquaintance with the subject will, however, convince most people that there are few questions of more general interest to the public at large. One of the greatest advantages any country can possess is a good administration of good laws, and it is impossible to have these except through the intervention of trained lawyers, and the better the training of those lawyers the better will be ceteris paribus the law which they must administer.

PLATFORM ACCIDENTS.

Perhaps of all cases which come before our courts in banc none are so difficult satisfactorily to dispose of as those which turn really on questions of fact. In cases where a jury may be suspected of a real, even if unconscious, leaning to one side or the other (such as actions by injured passengers against railway companies), it is perhaps necessary that the Courts should exercise some control over the decisions of the jury. Unfortunately, however, similar causes may interfere and undoubtedly do interfere to prevent the judges themselves as well as juries from exercising such sound judgment in these cases as in others. Judges as well as jurymen are railway travellers, and between their natural inclination on the one hand to look on such questions from the railway traveller's point of view, and their desire on the other to prevent this inclination on their own part and on the part of jurymen from leading to injustice, their position is undoubtedly peculiarly trying. Under these circumstances it is not to be wondered at that the Courts should arrive at decisions inconsistent with each other, or only to be made consistent by relying on differences of the minutest kind. One subject which of late has been fertile in producing difference of opinion amongst the judges is that of what, for want of a better term, we may call railway platform accidents, including in the term also, on the lucus a non lucendo principle, accidents which happen for want of a platform.

In these cases precedents are of little real value, the only questions of law that arise being those common to all actions for negligence. It is, of course, desirable to have, as far as possible, uniformity of decision, and if ever a case arose in which the facts were absolutely identical with those in a former one, it would be right to follow the former decision. In practice, however, this cannot happen. There must always be minute differences of fact; some, perhaps, raising arguments in favour of one side, and some of the other, but such as to render the case merely similar, but not identical. Under such circumstances, and the question really being in all the cases what view ought to be taken of the facts, it is a mistake to place too much reliance on former decisions. At the same time it is impossible to prevent their being quoted at the bar and noticed on the bench. Even when the reporters, coming to the conclusion that a particular case will be of no value as a precedent, omit to report it, yet it will be quoted from the recollection of counsel who have heard it argued, and in that form will be even more likely to mislead than if it had been regularly reported. The only real value of decisions in these cases is not as authorities, but as containing expressions of opinion by persons whose judgment is entitled to weight and respect. It is necessary to look, not so much at what the real facts of any case were, as at what the judges supposed them to be, or what inference they drew from them. And, having ascertained what view each individual judge took of the facts, then his opinion as to what the result ought to be may be of considerable value.

We propose shortly to notice some of the questions discussed in the recent cases, not with a view of reconciling or explaining the decisions, but of extracting any opinions that may be of value in discussing future cases. Siner v. The Great Western Railway, 16 W. R. 916, 17 W. R. 417, was the simplest case of all. There the train overshot the platform, or extended beyond it, and the plaintiff, a woman, jumped out, in daylight, and sprained her ankle. It was held by a majority, both in the Exchequer and Exchequer Chamber, that she ought to be nonsuited, the judges, however, giving somewhat different reasons. Most of the judges took the view that even if there were negligence on the part of the company, yet the injury of the plaintiff was not due to it, but to her own act in jumping out. That being so, it was pretty clear that she could not recover, at all events unless she could make out that she was invited by the defendants to do as she did. If she had been, and they had some means of knowledge which she had not as to whether or not it was safe for her to do so, the result might have been different. It being broad daylight, of course there was no pretence for saying that she could not see the danger, if there was any; the question whether the company invited her to descend, was not much gone into in this case, the majority of judges being apparently of opinion, that even if they had invited her, she should not have acted on the invitation, at all events without remonstrating and asking to have the train put back. It might seem to follow from this—certainly it would from the judgment of Baron Bramwell—that the amount or degree of danger to which it would be negligence for the company to subject a passenger, is necessarily the same as the amount or degree of danger which it would be negligent for the passenger knowingly to incur. This proposition, however, was expressly repudiated by the dissentient judges, and we do not think it can be considered established. There may well be a state of things, which though not in fact safe, the passenger may be entitled to consider safe, because it is held out to him by the company as being so, and this may be so, although he may have means of knowledge which, if he had not been thrown off his guard, would have enabled him to detect the danger. The question that has been so much discussed in the subsequent cases—viz., whether there has been an invitation to alight, and which it is said that the Queen's Bench and the Common Pleas have decided differently is, we think, somewhat misleading. In Bridge v. The North London Railway (not reported) the case seems to have been this, that upon a train approaching a station, the porters called out "Highbury," and the train came to a stand. A passenger for Highbury immediately proceeded to get out, though the train was then in a tunnel, and he was killed. In an action under Lord Campbell's Act, the plaintiff was nonsuited by Mr. Justice Blackburn, and a rule to set aside the nonsuit was refused by the Court of Queen's Bench. The nonsuit is said to have proceeded on the ground that the calling out the name of the station was no invitation to alight. On the other hand, Mr. Justice Willes says that calling out the name of a station is an invitation to alight not immediately but when the train has definitely come to a stand, the passenger using reasonable care in the manner of his alighting. This the learned judge has ruled at nisi prius in the cases of Petty v. The Great Western Railway Company, and Whittaker v. The Manchester & Sheffield Railway Company, repeating the observation with perhaps greater emphasis in the latter case in banc. We have, therefore, here, expressions of opinion which appear clearly contradictory. At the same time we should be much surprised if the learned judges of the Queen's Bench would not accept the qualified proposition of Mr. Justice Willes. Where they might probably differ with him would be in their judgment of what would be reasonable care on the part of the passenger in the manner of his alighting. Mr. Justice Blackburn, Mr. Justice Mellor, and also, no doubt, Baron Bramwell, would say that he had not exercised reasonable care if he got out without seeing where he was going to, and that he was bound to ascertain this for himself. Mr. Justice Willes, on the other hand, would say, if he could see the danger, he must not get out, but if he could not see it, the question would be whether he was entitled to suppose from the acts of the company that there was none. A mere calling out of the name of the station might not of itself entitle him to suppose this, but coupling this with the stoppage of the train, and the appearance opposite the carriage of anything that the passenger might reasonably suppose to be the platform, then he would be entitled to suppose he could safely get out. Thus, in Whittaker's case, there was a parapet of a bridge opposite the carriage which he took, and as the Court thought reasonably took, for a platform.

We have, probably, not heard the last of these cases; even if no new ones arise, there are two likely to go to the Exchequer Chamber—Cockley v. South Eastern Railway Company (18 W. R. 759), from the Common Pleas, where the Court, were equally divided; and Prager v. The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, not reported, from the Exchequer.

After all the refining of the judges, there seems little to be said except that a passenger must look before he leaps, and if he cannot see, then not leap until he is told to do so. When he can be considered as told to leap can be but a question of fact, although no doubt it will be for technical purposes (such as, whether the judge should nonsuit or not) a question of law whether there is any evidence upon that question of fact.

COURTS.

COMMON PLEAS.

(In Banco, before BOVILL, C.J., and SMITH, KEATING, and BRETT, JJ.)

June 15.—Varley v. Ellis.—Re an Attorney.

This was an informer's action for penalties to a large amount against the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph, who had inadvertently inserted various advertisements offering rewards for the recovery of stolen property, contrary to the provisions of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, which imposes a penalty, recoverable by the informer.

Giffard, Q.C., had obtained a rule calling on Mr. Thomas William Parks, the plaintiffs' attorney, to answer the matters in certain affidavits. It was alleged that the attorney himself brought the actions in the names of his clerk, Charles Russell, and of one Susan Varley, a relation of Russell, the object being, if he succeeded in the actions, to recover the penalties and his costs, and if he failed, to escape from the liability of paying costs to the defendant, his clerk, and his female relative, the nominal plaintiffs being quasi paupers, and unable to pay costs.

Robinson, Serjt., and Wood showed cause against the rule, and relied on the affidavit of Mr. Parks that he had not instigated the bringing of these actions, but had brought them on the instructions of the plaintiffs in the usual way, and that they were liable to him for costs.

BOVILL, C.J., said that when the rule was granted the Court had been led to believe that there were no such persons as Russell and Varley. It now appeared on affidavits that these two persons had instructed the actions to be brought in the usual way, and what seemed to be a case of suspicion was answered. The rule must, therefore, be discharged, as an attorney's clerk or any person else had a right to bring these actions.

KEATING and SMITH, JJ., concurred.

BRETT, J., dissented.—If the attorney had, as stated, put forward his clerk and a woman, a relative of his clerk, nominally to bring these actions for him, and, if he won, to obtain for him the penalties sued for and the costs, and if he failed, by this contrivance of pauper plaintiffs, to defraud the defendants of their costs, it was an exceedingly mean and dishonourable course, and the roll of attorneys ought to be purged of the name of such a person. What were the facts? He was entitled to form an opinion of them according to such knowledge of the world as he possessed. The proceeding was not a very well known section of an old Act of Parliament, and such only as a lawyer of some knowledge would be likely to be aware of. Was it likely Susan Varley would know anything about it, or that his clerk would commence proceedings of some risk if he were to be held responsible for the costs? He confessed that his suspicions were in accordance with the affidavits on which the rule had been obtained: But it was possible that the facts stated in the contrary affidavits might be true, and he therefore yielded his own impressions to those of the other judges of the court.

Rule discharged with costs.

June 14.—Business of the Court.

The COURT announced that there would be sittings in banco on the 22nd, 23rd, 28th, 29th, and 30th inst.; and that on Monday, the 11th of July, the Court would sit for the purpose of delivering judgments.

BAIL COURT.

(In Banco, before BLACKBURN and HANNEN, JJ.)

June 14.—Dugdale v. Solomons.

Re James H. F. Lewis, an attorney.

A rule had been granted calling upon Mr. Lewis, an attorney of this court, to show cause why he should not answer the matters in the affidavits. It was alleged that after the trial of the case of Dugdale v. Solomons Mr. Lewis, who was the attorney for the plaintiff, had sworn that four witnesses in the case had been each paid £11, whereas, in truth, cheques had been sent them for the amount, they being at the same time requested to hold over such cheques until after the taxation of the costs in order that it might be ascertained what amount the master allowed. These cheques were afterwards dishonoured, and the witnesses had never been paid. The matter was referred to the master, who this morning made his report, and therein stated his opinion that Mr. Lewis believed that the cheques would have been paid, and that there was no intent to benefit himself.

Parry, Serjt., for Mr. Lewis, urged that there had been no intention to defraud; but, as there had been great misconduct, he craved the merciful consideration of the Court.

M. Chambers, Q.C., contra.

The COURT said the only question was how this misconduct was to be punished; and they thought Mr. Lewis should be fined £25 and pay the costs of the rule.

Jacobs v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company.

BLACKBURN, J., gave judgment in this case. It was a rule for the master to review his taxation of costs. The action was brought for an injury sustained by the plaintiff. The defendants had suffered judgment by default. The main question was whether the master had done right in allowing one counsel instead of two. The master stated that when he allowed only one counsel he allowed him nearly as high an amount of fee as he should have given the two. This court would have discharged the rule, but they understood there had been a different practice in the other courts, and they had therefore made inquiry, and found that all the courts agreed that there ought not to be an inflexible rule, but that the master should exercise his discretion. Under all the circumstances the Court thought the rule should be made absolute, but without costs.

June 10.—Willett v. Harding.

Practice.

On the 7th April, at the Bristol Spring Assizes, before HANNEN, J., the plaintiff obtained a verdict for £45 10s., and on the 13th April the plaintiff accepted from the defendant £20 in full satisfaction of judgment, debt and costs. It being alleged that this settlement was made collusively and in fraud of the plaintiff's attorney, a summons was taken out by the plaintiff's attorney calling upon the plaintiff and defendant to show cause why they, or one of them, should not pay in his costs in the action, or why he should not be at liberty to sign judgment and issue execution.

R. P. Gould for the plaintiff's attorney; Baugh Allen for the defendant; the plaintiff did not appear.

BLACKBURN, J., made an order that the defendant pay the costs of the plaintiff's attorney, together with costs of summons (Ex parte Games, 33 L. J. Ex. 327, followed) with leave to apply to the Court, and, if advised, to file fresh affidavits.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs, Reed, Phelps, & Sidgwick.

Attorneys for the defendant, Stocken & Jupp.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

June 13, 14.—Ex parte Anderson, Re Anderson.

County Court appeal—Trial of issues—Venue—Practice.

This was a motion on behalf of Charles K. Anderson, to alter, reverse, or annul an order of the Walsall County Court, by which it was ordered that the questions of fact necessary to be tried for the purpose of determining the validity or otherwise of an alleged sale by the bankrupt, Matthew Anderson, to Charles K. Anderson, should be tried before that Court and a jury, and for an order restraining the assignee from prosecuting any proceedings against Charles K. Anderson until he should have returned to Charles K. Anderson the sum of £2,948, demanded and received by the assignee in January, 1870.

The petition was filed on the 24th December, 1869, and on the 28th December the Court adjudged Matthew Anderson a bankrupt. Previously to the adjudication a meeting of creditors was held, at which the whole of the creditors with one exception, agreed to accept a composition. On the 18th December, Charles K. Anderson, the brother of the now bankrupt, in consideration of a sum of £5,702, obtained an assignment of the whole of his brother's assets. He paid a portion of the purchase-money, leaving a sum of £2,948 owing. At the first meeting of creditors, held on the 20th January, an assignee was appointed, who afterwards, through his solicitor, applied to Charles K. Anderson for payment of the balance of the purchase-money, which Charles K. Anderson accordingly paid. Notwithstanding this, it was alleged that the assignee had since commenced, and was now carrying on, proceedings in the county court for the purpose of testing the validity of the assignment by the bankrupt to Charles K. Anderson; and the order under appeal had been made by the judge.

Manisty, Q.C., Bagley, and W. W. Karslake, for the appeal.—It was impossible that a case of this importance could be tried in a county court before a jury of five, and the expense of counsel and witnesses to prove the value of the goods, consisting of pictures, &c., comprised in the deed would be enormous. At all events the Court would require the assignee to refund the balance of the purchase-money, which he had improperly received before he proceeded in the county court. They cited Donovan v. Fricker, Jacob, 165; Orr v. Dickinson, Johns. 1; Colesworth v. Stephens, 4 Hare, 185; and as to the change of venue, Young v. Fernie, 12 W. R. 321.

De Gez, Q.C., and Reed, for the respondent, were not called upon.

The CHIEF JUDGE held that the order of the county court judge was properly made; that that court was perfectly competent to deal with the matter; and that this Court had no power to interfere with the venue. As to the repayment of the balance of the purchase-money, the appellant could not properly require it, for if he was the bonâ fide purchaser he had rightly paid it; if he was not, another point might arise. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. THOMAS COUSINS, solicitor, of Portsea, Hants, has been appointed Admiralty Coroner and Solicitor at Portsmouth, in succession to the late Mr. W. Swainson. Mr. Cousins was admitted in 1854, and has hitherto practised at Landport, Portsmouth, Southsea, and Portsea.

Mr. EDWARD AUGUSTUS HILDER, solicitor, of Gravesend, has been elected Vestry Clerk of the parish of Milton, adjoining that borough, in the place of the late Mr. F. Southgate. Mr. Hilder was certificated in 1836, and holds the offices of coroner of Gravesend, and replevy clerk for the county of Kent; he is also High Bailiff of the County Courts of Gravesend and Dartford.

Mr. EDWARD JONES, of Beaumaris, Anglesey, has been appointed Clerk to the Commissioners of Taxes for that district, in the room of his father, the late Mr. J. Watkins Jones, solicitor.

Mr. HAROLD CONSTANTINE BROWNING, solicitor, of Redditch, Worcestershire, has been appointed Clerk to the Local Board of Health, in succession to his father, Mr. Edward Browning, resigned.

Mr. EDWIN BEDFORD, of Haberdashers'-hall, Gresham-street, has been appointed a London Commissioner for administering oaths in the Court of Queen's Bench:

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

SALES BY AUCTION.

Sir.—The judge of the Worcester County Court (Mr. Kettle) recently took occasion to observe that in selling a piano by auction, a bidding on behalf of the vendor is illegal, unless openly stipulated for. This decision has been called in question by some of your commercial contemporaries, one of whom, after observing that such a sale cannot be within the purview of the Sale of Land by Auction Act, expresses a wish to know on what Act the judge founded such a dictum. I should be glad of some enlightenment on this matter.

A. B.

[The Sale of Land by Auction Act (1867) applies only to sales of land, but the rule of common law which that Act imposes on the Courts of Equity comprises sales of every description of property.—Ed. S. J.]

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

June 13.—Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Bill.—Committee.—Lord Chelmsford stated that he had prepared a proviso to be inserted in clause 4, which, as it had not yet been printed, he would propose at a future stage. He had heard of no ground for the introduction of the measure except the unsatisfactory nature of the existing arrangement, by which conveyancing business was remunerated in proportion to the length of the necessary documents. There was thus a premium on prolixity, and no inducement to employ skill in abbreviating the prolix forms which at present prevailed. In 1864 Lord Westbury brought in a bill enabling attorneys to enter into agreements as to the amount of remuneration for conveyancing business, but it was objected to as having a larger scope, and it failed to become law. This class of business was usually deemed the highest, and persons of the highest character being employed in it, he was sure they would not abuse the power now proposed to be given them; but he objected to the extension of such agreements to suits at law, on account of the overreaching and oppression which would inevitably result. In many cases, the clients being very ignorant, the attorneys would make a good bargain for themselves, and though it was true that the agreement might be brought before a court, and, if unreasonable, set aside, the parties in nine cases out of ten would not be aware of this mode of redress, and would not know whether the agreement was a fair one. The bill, moreover, would exempt these agreements from taxation, so that, they would be eagerly entered into for the purpose of avoiding the scrutinising eye of the taxing officer. He should have much preferred it had the bill been confined to conveyancing business, but he feared it could not be modified in this sense without being redrawn. His amendment, therefore, provided that when such an agreement related to any action or suit, the amount payable in it should not be paid until it had been examined and allowed by the taxing officer, who, if he deemed it unfair, might require it to be referred to the Court, which would be empowered to reduce it, or to order the costs to be taxed in the same manner as if no such agreement existed. Without such a proviso the operation of the bill would be most mischievous.—The Marquis of Salisbury said the object of the bill was to allow freedom of contract as far as possible, and to enable clients to get their work done at less expense. He saw no objection to the amendment.—Lord Romilly approved of the bill, believing that many persons would abstain from bringing actions if they knew what the cost would be. At present, if they asked an attorney whether he would undertake to carry on a suit for £10, the answer was that the law did not permit him to make such a bargain, but he believed the cost would not exceed that sum. He feared that the proviso would be merely an expensive form of taxation, for a person could not be before the taxing officer with evidence without expense. The opponent would not be bound by the agreement, for he would have to pay the taxed costs irrespective of the sum agreed on.—Lord Cairns generally approved the bill, but supported the proviso. The bill already provided that three agreements entered into by guardians and trustees, who might not be very strict in a matter where the costs would not come upon themselves, should be subject to the certificate of the taxing officer, and it was expedient to extend this safeguard to agreements relating to actions at law.—Lord Westbury feared the proviso would render the clause nugatory.—Lord Penzance remarked that the terms of the proviso would not apply it to the court over which he had the honour to preside. Unless this omission was supplied, very ignorant clients in the smaller class of cases would be much imposed upon.—The Lord Chancellor approved the object of the bill which would wipe away the reproach of the principle of remuneration according to length, whereas it was desirable that some scheme should be devised for regulating it according to brevity. The obvious reason of the present law was that, while in other agreements a man was advised by his solicitor, in an agreement with his solicitor he would have no advice or protection. The bill would tend to the benefit of the community in the majority of cases, certainly as regarded the more respectable practitioners, and the 8th clause provided that no action should be brought on these agreements until the Court had been applied to, to see whether they were fair or not. There was also a clause protecting infants and married women, for whom protection was imperatively necessary. As to the class who, though legally capable, were incapable through ignorance, they would be in some degree protected by the competition as to who would transact the business most cheaply. It was not desirable so to restrict the measure as to impede the operations of the more respectable class, whose clients would benefit from it.—Lord Chelmsford remarked that his noble and learned friend's picture of all the attorneys in a neighbourhood assembling about the carcass like a flock of vultures proved the necessity of protecting the unfortunate persons who might fall into their clutches. In the majority of cases the money would be squeezed out of the client, the agreement never coming before the Court, and he hoped that to prevent overreaching and oppression his proviso would be agreed to.—The bill then passed through committee.

The Wine and Beerhouses Act (1869) Amendment Bill was read a second time.

The Gas and Water Facilities Bill was read a second time.

The High Court of Justice Bill (Report of Amendments).—The Lord Chancellor said that Lord Cairns, while concurring in the change in the Courts of Judicature recommended by the commission over which he presided, desired that the Court of Appeal should be a branch of the High Court, and not, as proposed in the bill, a court apart—a view in which he deemed himself supported by the commission. He had no objection to adopt that view, and was accordingly prepared to amend the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill in that sense. Lord Cairns also contended that the rules of procedure essential to every Court should be embodied in the Act. Now, the rules of the existing Courts, which it was proposed to consolidate, were no less than 2,800 in number, and although those of the consolidated court would be less numerous, they could not be introduced into the bill unless it were deferred for a year, in order that they might be framed, which could not be done until the constitution of the court was settled.

His proposal had, therefore, been to delegate the task to a committee of the Privy Council, leaving it afterwards to the Court to make modifications. Lord Cairns, however, supported, with one exception, by all the law lords who addressed the House, urged that the rules should have the direct sanction of Parliament, instead of the indirect sanction of being laid on the table of both Houses before taking effect. Although not satisfied that this course was preferable, he was willing, provided the constitution of the Court was settled, as it would be if the bill passed, to superintend the framing of rules, obtaining such assistance as would be necessary, and to provide that, with the exception of one or two clauses, the bill should not come into operation until these rules had received the sanction of Parliament. One of the exceptions would relate to the power to appoint a Lord Justice of Appeals in Chancery, pending and subject to those changes. It had not hitherto been deemed expedient to fill up the vacancy caused by the death of Lord Justice Selwyn, on the ground that any person appointed should be prepared to submit to the changes which Parliament might think desirable; and though this course had been found fault with, he was happy to say that the appeals awaiting hearing, which in November were thirty-three, none of them of older date than the previous June, were now only thirty-six, although one appeal had lasted eleven days. During the Chancellorship of Lord Cairns the Court of Appeal in Chancery twice cleared its whole paper. The Government were desirous of avoiding any arrears in the business by at once appointing a Lord Justice, subject to the provisions of the bill. The other clause which would take immediate effect was that enabling the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, if a Privy Councillor, to sit, if appointed, on the Judicial Committee. He proposed in deference to the objections which had been urged, to strike out the clauses relating to the Home Circuit.—Lord Cairns was quite satisfied with these concessions. They would meet his objection to the separation of the new Court of Appeal from the High Court of Justice, and also his objection to the delegation to an extra-Parliamentary body of the settling of rules affecting the whole judicature of the country. The Lord Chancellor had taken a very wise course, and would, he trusted, have the satisfaction of seeing these bills become law this session, and thus of constituting the High Court, although it would not come into operation until the rules had been sanctioned by Parliament.—Earl Grey felt that the work of legislation in this country was getting absolutely choked by too great an amount of business. And in consequence the work was ill-performed, bills being passed in an imperfect and unsatisfactory state. This would inevitably be the case until some efficient means were adopted of lightening the heavy load of business and of making greater use of subsidiary authorities in order to prepare measures for legislation. Much had of late years been done in that direction, and the drawing up a vast number of rules relating to the procedure of courts of law was, above all, a case where Parliament should not be encumbered with too much detail. The control of Parliament should be maintained; but it was a wrong view of the duties of Parliament to keep within its walls matters of detail of this kind. In the earlier history of Parliament, it confined itself to the substance of legislation, leaving it to the judges to embody its wishes in statutes. He believed those earlier Acts, thus deliberately framed out of Parliament, compared more advantageously with Acts passed under the modern system, under which Parliament took cognisance of every detail and wording.—Lord Westbury regretted that he, like others both in and out of the house, had been terrified by the bugbear of the immense number of rules and orders which would be necessary. It being intended to lay down one simple form of pleading, and to supersede the existing forms, those who knew how essential forms were to justice required that the rules determining procedure should be embodied in a bill and sanctioned by Parliament. These would be as different from minute rules of practice as a principle was from its details, and if properly framed Parliament would avoid that "leap in the dark" which was as inexpedient with regard to our courts of justice as to any other part of our existing constitution.—Earl Granville commented on and justified his own previous assertion that he had noticed a tendency among law lords to pull each other's proposals of legal reform to pieces.—The report was then received, and the amendments agreed to.

The Appellate Jurisdiction Bill.—Re-committal.—The Lord Chancellor said the sole purpose of the amendments was to bring the Appellate Court into the system of the High Court of Justice. Mr. Justice Blackburn, Mr. Baron Bramwell, and Mr. Justice Smith had approved that very measure by approving the report of the Committee on Judicature, on which the bill was founded. Mr. Baron Bramwell did not concur in the resolutions of the judges.—Lord Cairns called attention to the serious alteration which this bill proposed to make in the salaries of succeeding judges. The salaries in the chief courts at present had been fixed, after long consideration, in pursuance of the recommendations of the committee on salaries, which sat some years ago. The common law judges had heavy circuit expenses. The arrangements proposed by the bill were not liberal enough. He thought the policy embodied in them very short-sighted.—Lord Penzance said that if the proposed Court of Appeal was to be appointed, the Lords Justices would be placed in an inferior position to the judges of the primary courts. That was a thing which had never been done with respect to the judges of an appeal court; and the principle involved in the change seemed erroneous. With regard to the judges of common law, it was true they would have nominally the same salary as the Vice-Chancellors and himself, but really they had very much less, because they were obliged to pay the expenses of circuit, which were not less than £600 a year. He did not see why they should not be placed in the same position as the judges of the other courts.—Lord Romilly ventured to say that if they diminished the salaries of the judges, already reduced as they were by the great increase of prices, and likely to be still more reduced by the rapid influx of gold from foreign countries, they would never get leaders of the profession to fill the office; they would only get subordinate persons, who would not possess that public confidence which judges ought to have.—The Lord Chancellor said that with regard to the alleged anomaly of a larger salary being received by a judge in a subordinate position, it was not the case that all judges of appeal received a higher salary than that received by the judges from whom the appeal might come. The right criterion was not whether by the offer of a certain salary they could secure any man, but whether they could secure a fit man.—The bill was ordered to be re-committed on Thursday next.

The Union of Benefices Amendment Bill.—The Bishop of Winchester said that, under existing Acts, two benefices could, under certain conditions, be united, and it was sometimes advisable to take down one of the churches and make one church, a larger one if necessary, serve for the united parishes. There was, however, no power to give to the parishioners of the church so pulled down parochial rights in the common church. The bill would remedy this defect.—The bill was read a second time.

The Benefices Resignation Bill.—The Bishop of Winchester said this bill proposed to apply to the beneficed clergy the principle applied last year to the episcopate, by enabling them, with the consent of the bishop and archbishop, when worn out in their duties, to retire, receiving one-third of the income by way of pensions. At present there was no power to charge a benefice with a retiring pension.—The bill was read a second time.

The Irish Land Bill.—Earl Granville moved the second reading; it was based on the principle that most Irish tenants required legislative protection.—The Duke of Richmond would not take on himself the responsibility of throwing the bill out, lest a worse one should follow; but he should propose amendments.—Lord Russell said the bill was the only measure that had ever adequately met the evil, because it was the only one that gave a tenant compensation for the loss of occupation. He congratulated everybody upon the bill.—Lord Oranmore said the bill contained principles never before accepted by any Legislature, and its passing would not stop agrarian outrages.—Lord Portsmouth supported the bill; Lord Liford objected to it.—Lord Dufferin said it was consistent with the rights of property and with previous legislation.—Lord Salisbury approved the compensation and purchase clauses. Irish landlords were numerically too few. Had that been otherwise this bill would never have been necessary. He disapproved of the clauses which limited the liberty of contract for the future, and those clauses which went beyond this he stigmatised as robbery.—Lord Kimberley said the bill did not require Irish landlords to do more than good landlords now did when they dispossessed their tenants.—Lord Bandon objected to many of the details of the bill.—Lord Monck supported the measure in its general scope.—Debate adjourned.

The Norwich Voters' Disfranchisement Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Bridgewater and Beverley Disfranchisement Bill was read a third time and passed.

June 16.—The Union of Benefices Act (1870) Amendment Bill passed through committee.

The Irish Land Bill.—Adjourned debate on the second reading.—Lord Cairns, after criticising the bill in detail, said no mercy would be shown to tenants in arrear, and the tendency of the bill would be to raise rents throughout Ireland, and to lead to the consolidation of farms. The power given to the tenant to drop from one scale to a lower one, the necessity of replacing the thirty-one years' lease by one of twenty-one years, and the clauses relative to conacre and the building of labourers' cottages, all needed amendments which might be made without touching the principles of the bill.—Lord Halifax thought the characteristics of the bill were substantially fair and just.—Lord Grey feared it would work badly; it gave no additional facilities for making contracts, and it would tend to discourage improvements by interfering with the free action both of landlord and tenant, and that it would promote litigation. Still, it must be passed, but the responsibility was the Government's.—Lord Athlumney thought the bill did not detract from the fair rights of property.—Lord Derby demurred to the composition principle and said the chief merit of the bill was that it would destroy the delusion among a certain class of Irish tenants that the land belonged to the occupier. It would not end an agitation which had been so successful, but he supported it because, all real grievances being now removed, all men would unite in defending English Government in Ireland.—The Duke of Argyll said the bill was necessary and just in itself, did not interfere unduly with the rights of property, and was fair and just to the people of Ireland.—The Duke of Abercorn approved the principle but highly objected to the machinery.—Debate adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

June 10.—County Government.—Mr. Campbell moved a resolution to the effect that the principle of representation ought to be applied to the Government and financial administration of counties.—Mr. Bruce said the Government had admitted in the Queen's Speech last session what reforms were necessary by the admission of the representative principle into the local administration of counties. This session no measure was brought forward, not simply for want of time, but because the whole subject of local taxation—its incidence and the manner in which it should be levied—was to be brought under consideration by the President of the Poor Law Board, who introduced a measure which had been referred to a select committee, and on the decision of that committee must in a great degree depend the constitution of county financial boards. He understood that evidence which covered the whole subject had been gone into by the committee. The question how far the rate should be levied from owners and occupiers was one on which the committee must give their decision, and surely on that decision it must very largely depend what should be the constitution of the future body, and where the electoral power should be vested. That was a sufficient reason for delay on the part of the Government in dealing with that part of the question. With respect to the other and larger question, the Government were not prepared to propose any large or sweeping changes. He must meet the motion with a decided negative.—Ultimately the motion was negatived by a majority of 61 to 39.

The Game Laws.—Mr. Locke drew attention to the attempts of this and the last session at legislation on this subject, and urged the importance of an inquiry.—Lord Royston said every gentleman in this country had a right to let his land in the way most advantageous to his pocket.—Sir L. Palk said that the best mode of settling this question would be to abolish the game laws altogether, and to substitute for them a stringent trespass law.—Mr. Bruce said the Government appreciated the difficulty in which the House was placed by the proposals respecting this question, but deprecated the appointment of a select committee to consider the subject. The Government would deal with the question on a very early day by a measure which would tend to reduce the quantity of ground game materially, and be generally as strong as it could be without infringing the rights of property.

The Commons Enclosure Bill.—Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen moved the second reading. The Act of 1845 had worked admirably with regard to facilitating enclosures, but it had failed to secure greater protection to the public and the poorer classes. The bill, instead of leaving the commissioners discretion as to whether any allotments should be made where the land was subject to allotment, would compel them to make allotments in every case of enclosure. The Government proposed that one tenth, instead of one ninety-ninth, should be devoted to this purpose, but the exact proportion could, of course, be fixed upon in committee. At present recreation ground, unlike an allotment, was free of rent-charge, but it was proposed to abolish this distinction, and to enact that whatever land was henceforth devoted to the public should be given free of rent-charge. There was likewise a distinction at present between common land over which common rights were exercised all the year round and commonable lands over which the public enjoyed rights only during certain portions of the year. Under the bill commonable land would be subject to allotment the same as common land. The bill further provided that commons situate within a certain distance of densely-crowded towns should not be enclosed without the consent of the local authorities.—Debate adjourned.

The Protection of Inventions Bill was read a second time. Advertisements Respecting Stolen Goods.—The Attorney-General introduced a bill to amend the law.

The Dividends on Stock Act of 1869.—Mr. Stansfeld introduced a bill to extend this Act to Ireland.

June 13.—The Universities Tests Bill passed through committee.

The Merchant Shipping Code Bill was read a second time and the order for committee postponed.

The Merchant Shipping Acts, &c., Repeal Bill was read a second time.

The Protection of Inventions Bill passed through committee.

June 14.—Trades Unions.—In reply to Mr. Melly, Mr. Bruce said he intended to bring forward a bill for the regulation of trades unions in the course of the present session, but if he proved unable to do so he should certainly introduce a bill to extend the operation of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 61, for another year.

The Authorised Version of the Bible.—Mr. Buxton moved that an address be presented to her Majesty praying that she would be graciously pleased to invite the President of the United States to concur with her Majesty in appointing commissioners to revise the authorised version of the Bible.—Mr. Gladstone thought there were objections to the civil Government dealing with this subject, though perhaps when the work was done it might take it up.—The motion was ultimately withdrawn.

June 15.—Representation of Minorities.—Mr. Hardcastle moved the second reading of a bill to repeal the minority clause of the Representation of the People Act (1867). The clause was irritating and a practical failure, gave preponderance to minorities under certain circumstances, and was a step towards that ingenious impossibility—Mr. Hare's scheme.—Mr. Collins said the clause was beneficial and had only been tried two years.—Mr. Gladstone said minorities ought to be represented and were represented without the clause, which was an inconvenient excrescence on the Act.—Mr. Morrison approved the clause as a step towards Mr. Hare's scheme.—Mr. J. Hardy supported it as securing the representation of people and not party.—Sir J. Grey said at least it should not be repealed without considering other plans for minority representation.—Mr. Walter said the minority must be heard and this clause secured that very fairly.—Mr. Disraeli was not fond of these new-fangled devices, but would not disturb the experiment so very soon.—Ultimately the bill was thrown out by a majority of 183 to 175.

June 16.—The Case of Mr. Mathieu.—In reply to Col. Edwardes, Mr. Bruce said Mr. Mathieu, when taken to Bow-street, refused his address and gave a wrong name. Strict inquiry had resulted in a conclusion that the police had not done anything other than their duty.

Mr. Leonard Edmunds.—In reply to Sir J. Elphinstone, Mr. Gladstone said the ground upon which Mr. Leonard

Edmunds had been arrested was his debt to the Crown of the sum of £7,904; and the authority on which he had been taken was the authority of the law, which had not been altered with respect to Crown debts by any recent legislation. They were advised that the Act for the abolition of imprisonment for debt did not affect Crown debtors, and that writs had been issued in consequence of the non-payment of Queen's taxes.

The Extradition of Criminals Bill was read a second time.

The Sligo and Cachel Disfranchisement Bill.—The second reading was carried by a majority of 158 to 23.

The Larceny Advertisement Bill was read a second time.

The Salmon Acts Amendment Bill was read a second time.

Investments for Charitable Purposes.—A bill by Sir Roundell Palmer was introduced, to amend the law as to the investment on real securities of trust funds for public and charitable purposes. Though primarily the bill had been rendered necessary by the passing of the Irish Church Bill of last year, its provisions were intended to apply, as its title indicated, to all trust moneys held for public and charitable purposes.—The bill was read a first time.

Apportionment of Rents.—A bill by Sir Roundell Palmer, for the better apportionment of rents and other periodical payments, was read a first time.

Party Processions (Ireland).—A bill by Mr. Chichester Fortescue to amend the law relating to certain processions in Ireland was read a first time.

Absconding Debtors.—A bill by Mr. S. Morley, to amend the law relating to absconding debtors, was read a first time.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The tenth anniversary festival of this society was held on Wednesday evening, the 15th inst., at the Freemasons' Hall. The chair was ably filled by the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Malins, and there were present about 100 members of the profession, among whom we noticed:—Messrs. W. B. Glasse, Q.C., M. Cookson, J. T. Crossley, Fitzroy Kelly, A. R. Bristow, H. Y. T. Young, Reginald Hughes, J. S. Torr, E. F. Burton, E. Benham, E. Hedger, J. A. Radcliffe, A. J. Bristow, W. F. Blandy, C. Diver, F. H. Rooke, H. Thorn, H. Sowton, J. E. Turner, J. W. Proudfoot, J. Tassell, J. Alexander, F. Carnell, F. H. Hallett, T. F. Peacock, F. W. Topham, H. A. Dowse, J. T. Fry, W. J. Fraser, H. W. Trinder, W. Keary, L. Emanuel, T. Hamlin, W. T. Manning, G. C. Greenway, W. Ruston, H. Briggs, J. Heather, J. Heather, jun., R. S. Mason, G. D. Cooke, F. Buckland, W. Yewd, G. Sumner, H. J. Torr, F. Filliter, W. Chubb, H. A. Deane, J. W. Howlett, H. M. Cotton, A. Rawlinson, C. H. Gates, St. Barbe Sladen, J. Fluker, T. W. Goldring, W. H. Haycock, E. J. Milliken, J. Callaway, F. Brand, Esqs., and Mr. Secondary Potter.

The cloth having been removed, and grace sung effectively by a glee party under the direction of Mr. W. J. Fielding,

The CHAIRMAN proposed the health of the Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the rest of the Royal family, which were received in the usual loyal manner.

In proposing "The army, navy, and volunteers," the Chairman said the two former were ancient institutions; known and beloved by all, but the latter was a more recent growth which threatened to divide public favour with its predecessors. In default of any direct representative of the army or navy he would couple with the toast the name of Mr. Bristowe, solicitor to the Admiralty, and Captain Bathurst of the Kentish Volunteers.

Mr. BRISTOWE, in responding on behalf of the navy said, that although it so happened that at the present moment the English navy was in a state of transition, the once boasted "wooden walls" rapidly giving place to iron vessels or ships constructed of iron and copper, still whatever might be the material of which our navy was constructed, it was manned by the same lion-hearts which had carried the English flag to victory in every sea and in every clime.

Captain BATHURST having responded on behalf of the volunteers,

Mr. GLASSE, Q.C., proposed the health of her Majesty's judges, a body of men, who by their learning, industry, and integrity, had won the respect and esteem of the nation. They had not present any of her Majesty's common law judges, but they were presided over by one of the equity judges who had already earned for himself the regard of all whose duties brought them in contact with him.

The CHAIRMAN in responding to the toast, said, he believed, that to the distinguished body of men for whom he had the honour to return thanks, England owed the deepest obligations. Their duties were very arduous, and in the discharge of those duties, he believed—at any rate, he could speak for himself—they frequently erred, but when they did so, it was not from any lack of desire to do their duty, but simply because, from the nature of the case, it was impossible they could always be right. It was most pleasing to find himself on this occasion surrounded by a body of men with whom he had been so associated for so many years, from whom he had received so many marks of kindness, and with whom he was always pleased to renew his acquaintance on those occasions when his public duties brought him in contact with them.

Mr. BURTON, in proposing the health of the bar, said that, much as we might be captivated by the eloquence for which the bar was distinguished, that was not to be compared with its more sterling qualities. The bar stood pre-eminent in the world for its learning. The medical profession and the profession of physical science could alone come near it for learning, but no one knew so well as solicitors did that, although the barrister was constantly engaged in taking opposite sides of the same question, he did so without the sacrifice of personal truth; and no one knew also better than solicitors did that, although constantly pleading before the same judges, and looking to the Crown for promotion, the bar did its duty fearlessly and without sacrificing its independence. He was happy to say there was now no jealousy or rivalry between solicitors and the bar. That had long passed away. Fifty years ago solicitors held a different position; since then solicitors had made great progress in education and status, and they now held a very much higher position. Socially they met on terms of equality with the bar, and he was content professionally to yield to the bar the higher place. It was from the bar that the judges were selected, the bar sent a large proportion of the legislators into the House of Commons, and the bar sent into the House of Lords the law lords—that element without which he supposed the levelling hands of Mr. Bright would have swept away that branch of the legislation. To solicitors the highest honour we could aspire, he supposed, was to be a lord mayor. But though the highest honours in the law were not open to solicitors, they might at least hope to see their sons fill the highest positions in the law. He thought there was no more beautiful touch of nature to be found in Tennyson than where he described Enoch Arden lying in his boat enduring the hardship of a fisherman's life, but consoling himself with the prospect of putting his son in a higher position than his own. He (Mr. Burton) would next allude to the observations that had fallen from a learned judge when presiding over a similar meeting of this society two years before. He referred to the suggestion that fell from that judge that the two branches of the profession should be amalgamated. He (Mr. Burton) doubted if that were the expression of a deliberate conviction on the part of that most learned judge, all of whose opinions were entitled to the greatest respect. But he differed with him entirely on that question. It was very well in the colonies where there was comparatively little to do and few to do it, that every man should do all that came in his way. But in a wealthy country and with well-filled ranks of the professions, we were entitled to all the advantages of the division of labour. Division of labour always made excellence of workmanship, and if one man was eloquent, another skilful as a conveyancer, another in advising clients, and another in conducting correspondence, was it not better that each should devote himself entirely to that in which he excelled.

Mr. MONTAGU COOKSON, responded to the toast, and in the course of his observations said he believed it would be a very unfortunate thing if the distinction at present existing between the two branches of the profession were removed, at the same time he rejoiced to find there was a prospect of proper means being taken for ensuring a thorough legal education being possessed by all members of both branches, and this must be founded in each case on the same broad principles. Some parties had also advocated the establishment of a Legal University, but this he did not apprehend was in any sense necessary, and, in fact, it was a misnomer to term an institution for teaching one branch of learning a University.

The CHAIRMAN, in proposing the toast of the evening, "The Solicitors' Benevolent Association, and may prosperity attend it" said: We are assembled here to night gentlemen, I hope every one of us, from a feeling of benevolence, for we are met in order to promote the interests of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association. Before I go further, perhaps you will permit me to say a word with regard to the memory of my late friend who presided at this meeting last year—the late Lord Justice Selwyn. Indeed, it is not consonant to my feelings to let the present occasion pass over without some allusion to my excellent and valued friend of so many years standing, whom you will all remember last year presided on this occasion in that spirit of hilarity and good fellowship which always distinguished him. I saw him myself about a fortnight afterwards, when he appeared in the most vigorous health; in fact, I never saw him better, and you all know how soon after he was taken from us. I cannot, therefore, omit this allusion as showing us the uncertainty of all human affairs, and as proving that, however prosperous you may be—and no man could be more prosperous than he was in every sense of the word—you cannot tell how long that prosperity will last. This is a subject which well introduces the objects of this society, which is an association for the benefit of a great profession, that of the solicitors of England—a profession which probably in its results upon mankind is of greater importance than any other profession which can be named. Whoever is in trouble, the first thing he does is to apply to his solicitor, and whoever is in prosperity the same thing happens, he applies in the same quarter. It is a great profession, but there are necessarily prosperous and unprosperous members of it, and those who are prosperous to day may not be prosperous to morrow. No human being can foresee or contemplate that which may happen in the future, and it is, therefore, of the highest possible importance that men should gather together for the purpose of supporting those who may be placed in circumstances rendering them unable to support themselves. The object of this society, therefore, that of supporting its poorer members—not those who are now poor, but the apparently rich members who may, through unforeseen circumstances, become poor—is one which commends itself to the good feeling of all men. How then are its objects to be carried out? This is an association which, it appears, has existed for twelve years, having been established in 1858. Having been called upon to preside upon this occasion—and I can assure you I felt it a very great honour to preside over a body of gentlemen for whom I entertain so much regard and respect—I thought it my duty to look into your affairs, to see what you have been doing, what you are doing, and what you are likely to do. I find it stated that, whereas the solicitors in England number more than 10,000, you have not yet obtained the support of more than one-fifth of that number in twelve years. We all know how difficult it is, and our daily experience shows it, to enlist the interest of persons in any cause whatever. We all receive so many applications for charity of various descriptions—at least, I myself do—that I verily believe the public are under the impression that a vice-chancellor has the unlimited command of the Suitors' Fee Fund. I do not doubt that all here have the same demands made upon them, but certainly it seems to be the general impression that a vice-chancellor can do anything. If anybody wants a situation he goes to the vice-chancellor, if anybody wants money they apply to the vice-chancellor. Therefore as we are all called upon so much, it is not altogether surprising that during the period of twelve years you have only succeeded in obtaining the support of one-fifth of the profession. But, gentlemen, I do think, considering the objects you have in view, that some impression ought to be made upon the remaining 8,000 who have not yet joined. You cannot expect to gain them all, but I am perfectly certain that by continued effort you will gain the support of a much larger number than you yet have; and I cannot help thinking that as years go on, and the objects of this society are more distinctly brought before the profession, you will gain the support of a very large number of the solicitors of England who have not yet sent in their names. Amongst these there are no doubt many who are not able to join, and there may be others who, though not unwilling to do so, have not yet had their attention sufficiently drawn to it—not from any fault of the society, for I understand that some 10,000 circulars are issued every year, and that you invite all her Majesty's judges, Queen's counsel, and members of the bar, to be present on this occasion—but nevertheless these three branches of the profession are but slenderly represented here this evening. It is not, I believe, from any want of willingness to support so valuable an association, but because men are so much engaged. There are so many calls upon their time and attention that they cannot do very often what they would in such a matter. So it is, no doubt, with regard to the members of the profession itself, and yet I do consider it to be a sacred duty which every man owes to support his own profession, and to aid the charities of that body of men with whom he happens to be associated, and through whose assistance he has to carry on the business of life, whose success is his success, and whose prosperity he ought to look to as a subject of rejoicing to himself. I cannot help thinking, therefore, that by continued applications you will yet obtain the support of those who have not yet joined, and if you only get 4,000 to do so, and to subscribe one guinea a-year, you will then have an additional income of 4,000 guineas, and with that sum of money what can you not accomplish? I have already said that I considered it my duty to look into the affairs of your association as far as I could, and I find the principle adopted is that your annual subscriptions are capitalised, so that you have already £18,000 invested, producing an income of £700 or £800. If I understand correctly, you distribute only the income of your accumulated fund, and I suppose the same system will go on from year to year. Now I hope you will understand that in what I am about to say I speak with all humility, and the suggestion which I am about to make is one which has occurred to my mind totally unbiassed, for I have not spoken with anyone on the subject till I came into this room. But it does appear to me, if I may say so, that the constitution of your society may be considerably improved, and in this way. Your annual income is about £2,196, and I find you have been enabled to distribute only £515 in the way of donations or assistance to the poorer members of the society. I would very humbly suggest to you whether it would not be better instead of capitalising all your subscriptions and donations—inasmuch as to all of us the present time is of the greatest importance, and futurity is nothing in comparison—to distribute at least one-half of your annual income and invest the remainder; thus, at the present time, instead of distributing £515 a-year you would be able to distribute £1,500. And I would further suggest that when your accumulated fund has reached a certain point, say £20,000, you would do wisely to distribute the total amount of your annual income received from subscriptions and donations amongst those who ought to be the permanent and primary objects of your consideration—viz., not those who may hereafter be in difficulties, but those who are so now. This idea has occurred to me, and I very humbly submit it for the consideration of the members of the society. I will not detain you any longer, except to say, that I most cordially thank you for the honour which you have conferred upon me in asking me to preside upon this occasion.

Mr. EIFFE (Secretary) read the list of new donations and subscriptions amounting in the whole to about £700, there being seventy-two new annual subscribers.

Mr. A. R. BRISTOWE then proposed the health of the Chairman, who, notwithstanding his numerous public avocations, found time to come amongst them and advocate, as he had so forcibly, the cause in behalf of which they were assembled. He had had the honour of the Vice-Chancellor's acquaintance for many years, not only when he was a practising barrister, but also as a member of Parliament advocating the rights of the people, and since then he had been a suitor in his court and had received substantial justice at his hands. In all these relations of life he had acquitted himself so as to command the esteem of his fellow-men, and in his capacity as one of her Majesty's judges he had attained amongst the profession to which he (Mr. Bristowe) belonged, a deserved popularity. He had, therefore, much pleasure in wishing him long life and continued prosperity.

The CHAIRMAN, in returning thanks, said he had known most of those present for many years, for it was now forty years since he was called to the bar. He came to London knowing and known by no one, and having spent the usual time in a conveyancer's chambers studying Coke upon Littleton and other old writers who were too much neglected in the present day, he had to wait day after day and month after month until business came to him ; and he supposed from the kind manner in which he had been received that day that his perseverance had not been altogether unappreciated. The success which he had attained he did not attribute to any superior abilities, but to his continued industry, and more than all to his earnest desire to promote the interests of his clients, so far as they were consistent with truth and honour, and no farther. This had been his guiding principle, and to it he believed he owed his present position. With regard to the much talked-of amalgamation between the two branches of the profession, he would only say that he believed it was one of the distinguishing glories of England that the two branches of the legal profession, each equally respectable, were kept distinct, one gentleman communicating with the client, and the result of those communications being submitted to another, who, uninfluenced by any personal consideration, gave an opinion upon the abstract merits and justice of the case.

The list of toasts was concluded by the health of the committee and secretary, proposed by Mr. Young and acknowledged by Mr. Eiffe.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

The president, vice-president, and council of the Incorporated Law Society entertained a distinguished party at dinner at the hall of the society on Tuesday last. The guests included Mr. Justice Willes, Mr. Baron Bramwell, Mr. Justice Lush, Sir Barnes Peacock, the Attorney-General, Sir John Karslake, Q.C., Sir George Honeyman, Q.C., Mr. Garth, Q.C., Dr. Tristram, D.C.L., Master Bennett, Dr. Percy, F.R.S., Mr. F. O. Haynes, Mr. Wm. Murray, Mr. H. C. Lord, Mr. Kenelm Digby, Mr. Charles Spencer Percival, Mr. Meadows White, Mr. Sills, &c.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society, held on Tuesday, the 14th June instant, Mr. Widdows in the chair, the question for discussion was No. 456, legal:—"Can a suit for divorce be prosecuted against a respondent, who becomes insane before plea, during the continuance of such insanity?" Bawden v. Bawden, 10 W. R. 292; Mordaunt v. Mordaunt, 18 W. R. 845.

Mr. Konrick opened the debate in the affirmative, and Mr. Austin in the negative. The society finally decided the question in the affirmative.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Easter Term, 1870.

FINAL EXAMINATION.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of 26, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

1. Frederick George Hindle, who served his clerkship to Mr. Charles Kendall, of Darwen, Lancashire; and Messrs. Pritchard & Englefield, of London.
2. Augustus Frederick Warr, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Bateson, Robinson, & Morris, of Liverpool; and Messrs. Field, Roscoe, Field, & Francis, of London.
3. Walter May Barton, who served his clerkship to Mr. Charles Wright, of East Dereham, Norfolk; and Messrs. Whites, Renard & Floyd, of London.
4. John Joseph Faulkner, who served his clerkship to Mr. William Tomalin, jun., of Northampton; and Messrs. Vizard, Crowder, Anstie & Young, of London.
5. John Dickinson, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Brockbank & Helder, of Whitehaven; John Proffitt, who served his clerkship to Mr. William Henry Duignan, of London and Walsall.
6. John Attenborough, who served his clerkship to Mr. Charles Edwards Freeman, of London.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the following prizes of books:—

To Mr. Hindle, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's Inn.

To Mr. Warr, the prize of the Honourable Society of New Inn.

To Mr. Barton, Mr. Faulkner, Mr. Dickinson, Mr. Proffitt and Mr. Attenborough, prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

The examiners also certified that the following candidates, under the age of 26, whose names are placed in alphabetical order, passed examinations which entitle them to commendation:—

James Frankland, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Gray & Pannett, of Whitby; and Messrs. Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, of London.

William Thomas Hindmarsh, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Wilson & Middlemas, of Alnwick; and Messrs. Shum & Crossman, of London.

Leonard Wilson Taylor, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Hesp, Fenton & Owen, of Huddersfield.

The Council have accordingly awarded them certificates of merit.

The number of candidates examined in this term was 106; of these 94 passed and 12 were postponed.

Among the guests were the Treasurers of Lincoln's-inn and the Inner Temple, Lord Chief Justice Bovill, the Lord Chief Baron, Vice-Chancellors Stuart and Malins, Mr. Justice Lush, Mr. Serjeant Payne and Mr. Serjeant Sargood. Previously to dinner the annual prize, amounting to £25 (an exhibition founded by Mr. John Lee, Q.C., LL.D., late a bencher of the inn, deceased), for the best essay selected for this year upon the following subject:—"The law of distress in England as compared with that of Prussia, France and America, with suggestions for a revision," was awarded to Mr. John Procter, a student of the society; and the subject of the essay for the ensuing year was announced to be as follows:—"The feudal tenures, their origin, their nature, and the causes which led to their abolition."

OBITUARY.

MR. E. WARD.

Mr. Edmund Ward, solicitor, of Prescott, Lancashire, died on the 12th June, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. The late Mr. Ward was certificated in 1831, and for many years was chairman of the Board of Guardians of the Prescott Union. He was also a trustee of numerous local charities, and was chairman of the Conservative Association of the borough.

MR. T. DARWELL.

Mr. Thomas Darwell, solicitor, of Manchester, died at Burton-upon-Irwell, near that city, on the 13th June. Mr. Darwell, who was certificated in 1840, was a member of the local firm of Beener, Darwell, & Taylor.

MR. C. E. STANGER-LEATHES.

Mr. Charles Edmund Stanger-Leathes, solicitor, of Bombay, and clerk of the peace for that city, died at Simla, in Northern India, on the 1st of May, killed by a fall from a precipice. He was the fourth son of the Rev. Hugh Stanger-Leathes, of Trent Villa, Leamington, and was formerly in business in the city of London, as a member of the firm of W. & S. Cotton, King & Leathes, of Lothbury. He went out to Bombay in 1856, and there joined the firm of Collier & Leathes, the senior member of which, Mr. C. F. Collier, is now practising at the English bar. On Mr. Collier leaving for England, Mr. Leathes received his brother, Mr. F. S. Leathes, into partnership. Mr. Leathes was clerk to the old board of Municipal Commissioners at Bombay, and on the new Municipal Act coming into operation, he was appointed clerk and solicitor to the Bench of Justices. He was contemplating retiring from business when he met with the accident which terminated his career.

On Thursday last the Master of the Rolls took an opportunity of remarking that he had lately had before him a great number of cases where property had been purchased upon what turned out to be no title whatever, and the purchasers had in consequence been ejected. Some of the conditions of sale he had seen were really startling. His remarks were only intended to apply to cases of small properties.

DIRECTIONS TO TAXING MASTERS.

Trinity Term.

On taxation of costs on a writ of inquiry, the master should allow only for one counsel, unless in the exercise of his discretion on all the circumstances of the case, including the amount in dispute, he is satisfied that there was more to do in the case than could reasonably be imposed on one counsel only.

Mr. Justice Montague Smith remains in town.

Ten days' notice of trial must be given, exclusive of date and inclusive of the above commission days.

In Calcutta there are 133 barristers, attorneys, pleaders, and law agents paying the licence tax.

Mr. William Smith, solicitor, and secretary to the Sheffield Chamber of Commerce, was presented, on June 3, with a pair of massive silver candelabra, in acknowledgment of his services to the chamber.

The sub-committee of the Salford General Purposes Committee, appointed to consider and report upon the resignation of Mr. Brett, the Town Clerk, have recommended that the future Town Clerk should devote the whole of his time to the duties of the office and the legal business of the Corporation. The salary is fixed at £800 per annum. The report was approved by the Committee, and recommended to the Town Council for adoption.

Mr. William Unwin Heygate, barrister-at-law, has been elected M.P. for South Leicestershire, in the room of Lord Curzon, who has succeeded to the peerage as Earl Howe. Mr. Heygate is the second son of the late Sir William Heygate, Bart. (who was Lord Mayor of London in 1822, and was afterwards elected Chamberlain of the City), by Isabella, fourth daughter of Edward Longdon Mackmurdo, Esq., of Upper Clapton. He was born in London in 1825, and was educated at Eton and at Merton College, Oxford, where he took classical honours in 1847, and graduated M.A. in 1850. In November of the same year he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, and for some time practised as an equity draughtsman and conveyancer, but latterly gave up his professional practice. He was elected M.P. for Leicester in January, 1861, but was unsuccessful at the last general election.

THE COUNTY COURTS.—In the 23 years which have elapsed since the establishment of county courts in England there have been above 15,000,000 plaints entered for the recovery of sums amounting to nearly £39,000,000. A large proportion of the COMMON PLEAS.

This Court will on Wednesday, the 22nd, Thursday, the 23rd, Tuesday, the 28th, Wednesday, the 29th, and Thursday, the 30th days of June inst., hold sittings in Banc, and will proceed with the Special Paper; and will also hold a sitting on Monday, the 11th day of July next, for the purpose of delivering judgments.

EXCHEQUER OF PLEAS.

Sittings at Nisi Prius in Middlesex and London, before the Right Hon. Sir FITZ-ROY KELLY, Knt., Lord Chief Baron of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, after Trinity Term, 1870.

Middlesex.

Friday, June 17, to Thursday, June 30, both inclusive. Special juries and common juries.

London.

Friday, July 1, to Thursday, July 14, both inclusive. Special juries and common juries.

The Court will sit at Nisi Prius on Mondays at half-past ten o'clock, and on all other days at ten o'clock.

A second Court will sit for the trial of causes when necessary.

This Court will, on Thursday, the 7th July next, hold a sitting, and will at such sitting proceed in giving judgment in matters then standing for judgment.

cases are settled without further proceedings, but judgment was entered in 8,712,902 for sums amounting to £20,804,023, exclusive of costs. Only 19,585 causes were tried by jury. The court fees have amounted to £3,581,708. The average amount for which the plaintiffs were entered was rather more than 50s.; in 1849 the average amount sued for per plaintiff was 63s.; in 1859 it was only 49s.; in 1869 it was 57s. A return relating to 1850 showed further details. Three-fifths of the suits commenced were for sums not exceeding 40s.; 55 in every 100 were tried, and more than half the causes tried were for sums not exceeding 40s. There are 59 county court circuits in England, besides the City of London Court. In 1869 946,643 plaintiffs were entered, the sums claimed amounting to £2,692,073. In that year the courts sat on 8,162 days, and determined 553,473 causes; judgment was given for sums amounting to £1,358,164, besides £62,558 costs, exclusive of fees. The total amount of court fees was £366,555. Only 1,103 cases were tried by jury. 181,922 executions were issued against goods, and 4,962 sales were made; 9,769 debtors were imprisoned. These numbers include the City of London Court. Many additions have been made since the Act of 1846 to the jurisdiction of these courts, and much other work than that above stated was done in 1869. There were 4,931 adjudications in bankruptcy in the county courts; and the gross produce realised was £70,013. There were 462 Admiralty suits or proceedings; 144 vessels were arrested, and 163 final decrees were made; the amount of claims was £40,733. Proceedings were taken in 761 equitable suits or proceedings; 249 were for the administration of estates; 55 for the execution of trusts; 122 for foreclosure or redemption or enforcing a lien; 117 for specific performance; 64 for dissolution or winding-up of a partnership. 738 orders were made for the protection of the property of deserted wives. The county courts did their share of work in 1869.—Times.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The business done this week in Consols has been rather small, and they close at a decline. Foreign securities were at one time exceedingly buoyant, they then fell and are now recovering. In the railway market the transactions have been small, but prices have been tolerably steady. The prospects of an indifferent harvest have caused a demand for money in anticipation of an increased food importation this autumn.

The liquidators of Overend, Gurney, & Co., announce the payment, on the 29th and 30th inst., of the last instalment due to the creditors, amounting to nearly £250,000. A small portion of this amount is to be met by the realisation of assets, but the liquidators have made arrangements which they believe will enable them to pay the creditors without making further calls on the shareholders, to whom they hope eventually to make some return. But before this can be done the liquidators must discharge the engagements now made.

LONDON, JUNE 25, 1870.

WHAT IS A "SWORN BROKER?" This is a question to which it would be difficult to get a definite answer west of Temple Bar. East of that edifice the querist would be told that before a broker can practice as such in the City of London he must take an oath faithfully to discharge his duties, and enter into a bond with two sureties for £250 each to observe what he has sworn, and that besides this he must pay small entry and annual fees to the Corporation. The court of aldermen have jurisdiction to hear charges against brokers with a view of striking them off the list of sworn brokers. Directly a charge is made against a broker the court calls upon him to answer it without even requiring the complainant to make out a prima facie case. If the charge is dismissed the court cannot award compensation to the broker, nor can he bring an action for slander or libel, the complaint being a privileged communication. Such being the state of affairs it is not surprising that the brokers are anxious to be emancipated from this civic jurisdiction. As long ago as 1844 a commission reported against it. In 1854, and again in 1865, bills were brought in to abolish it, but in both instances they miscarried. This session Mr. W. Fowler has brought in a bill with the same object, which was before the House of Commons on Wednesday last, but the debate on the second reading was adjourned. The arguments used in support of the bill are—(1) that the present law by compelling brokers to give security for due performance of their duties attaches a stigma to them, which is not attached to any other class of persons who are entrusted with power over the property of their clients; (2) that brokers in London should not be subject to restrictions from which brokers in the provinces are exempt; (3) that the jurisdiction is useless: security for £500 being inadequate to the amount and value of property passing through a broker's hands; (4) that the jurisdiction is worse than useless, because it is no real guarantee of the trustworthiness of a broker. This is shown by the fact that there are many sworn brokers who are not recognised by the Stock Exchange. This being so the position of a sworn broker may mislead unwary persons, who suppose that they are safe in dealing with anyone who is stamped by the Corporation as fit for his duties. The argument against any change is that there ought to be some superintending authority over brokers as there is over barristers, solicitors and doctors. Granting this, there is still the question—is that superintending authority properly placed, when lodged, as it is at present, in the Corporation.

SIR G. JENKINSON'S BILL for providing a court of appeal in capital cases has been rejected on the second reading without a division. It scarcely found a friend, except its author, and the machinery of the bill was universally condemned. At the same time, Mr. G. Gregory, and some other members, expressed dissatisfaction with the existing state of things. We cannot regret the rejection of this particular measure, as we have always considered it impracticable (see ante p. 463). At the same time, we adhere to our opinion that some alteration in the present system is required. Punishment can never be effective unless inflicted in accordance with public opinion, and this it can never be as long as sentences are commuted or confirmed according to the result of a secret inquiry. At present, the grounds of the confirmation or commutation are never made public at all, except in the form of a defence of the Home Secretary after exception has been taken to his conduct. If the explanation should be ever so clear and satisfactory, it generally comes too late to remedy the mischief, as an opinion once formed is very difficult to shake.

While, however, we shall be glad to see a remedy for the present state of things adopted, we certainly hope that Sir G. Jenkinson will discontinue for the present his efforts to introduce one, and also leave to some other member the task of extracting from the Home Secretary justifications of his conduct from time to time. The honourable member's efforts are, no doubt, thoroughly well-intentioned, but they are likely, if persevered in much longer, to make the whole subject a bore.

WE OBSERVE THAT THE LATE lamentable accident on the Great Northern Railway has already affected the value in the Stock Exchange of the shares of the companies interested. This seems to us to be a case in which the public have somewhat hastily jumped to a conclusion which they would not have arrived at if thoroughly acquainted with the law. We are, of course, writing before the facts have been absolutely ascertained, but taking them to be as at present reported it is difficult to see how any liability to compensate the injured passengers can be established, either against the Great Northern or the Sheffield Company. Redhead v. The Midland Railway, 17 W. R. 737, finally decided that companies were only liable to their passengers for negligence and not as insurers. It seems impossible to say that the driver of the Great Northern train or their guards or signalmen were at all to blame; and it is stated that the waggons of the goods train had been examined shortly before the accident and no defect had been found. If it should turn out that this examination was a sufficient one, which the happening of the accident certainly does not negative, as it is well-known that defects in iron are frequently incapable of detection, we do not see how the Great Northern Company can be made liable. As regards the Sheffield Company, if they knowingly sent on to the Great Northern line a defective wagon it is possible that they might be held responsible, but it is unlikely that any knowledge of the defect can be brought home to them. A plaintiff might have a slight chance of success if he could make out that there had been negligence on the part of the manufacturer of the wagon. If that could be shown as a fact, it is possible that, upon the analogy of a recent case in the Queen's Bench (Francis v. Cockrell, 18 W. R. 668, the decision in which was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber on Tuesday last) some liability might be thrown on one or other of the companies. This, however, is not very likely in fact, and the propositions of law which would have to be maintained are very far from clear.

THE "TIMES" PUBLISHES THIS WEEK more complaints from jurymen. Considering that the defects in the system upon which juries are summoned are patent to judges, lawyers, and the public, that a Special Commission has reported on the means by which the present system should be amended, that there is no disagreement as to the principal alterations which ought to be adopted, and that a bill of last year was dropped for want of time, it is really too bad that with the close of this session near at hand no enactment should have been passed on this matter. We believe that the grievance complained of by the Times correspondents of this week—viz., the heaping of summonses beyond all reason on some individuals while others escape altogether, is much enhanced by the indirect practice of persons summoned "tipping" the officer. If a person liable to serve on juries "tips" the summoning officer that functionary takes care that he is not troubled with summonses. But jurymen must remember that if they "tip" once they must be prepared for a periodical blackmail. A jurymen recently said that having been weak enough to pay once, he resolved not to do so in future. About the period when the summoning officer considered his "tip" to have become exhausted by effluxion of time he received a summons as a reminder, and as he did not respond in the desired manner he had ever since been pestered with summonses, as a man capable of being remunerative.

SOME OF THE MOST AMUSING LIGHT READING of the day will be found in the evidence now in course of delivery before the Judicature Commission. A few days ago a witness from the north of England, the chief officer of a local court, told the Commission that his court was highly popular, the people liking it because it was their own, while the county court was looked upon as a sort of intruder, and the judge as a stranger. The witness concluded by admitting that his court had only had four cases to try during the past year. Another witness, a chief officer of a London local court, frankly admitted that his court was obsolete, and really did no business, and with some simplicity defended its existence, on the ground that the expenses, amounting to several hundreds per annum, being paid out of corporate funds, were not paid by the public, who had, therefore, no right to complain. The witness finished his evidence with the argument that as the court did no business it did no harm, and therefore ought not to be interfered with. This witness was also examined as to another office he held, that of high bailiff of a county court. He produced some books to show the Commissioners the extent of his labours, and spoke of a large amount of work as performed by himself. He, however, admitted, on cross-examination, that he did not do the work at all, but had it done by subordinates paid by the Treasury. He was then pressed to explain what he really did, when it appeared that he called the causes, sat in court by the defendants' box, and asked them for their agents if the money claimed was due; if it was, he asked how it could be paid, and another formal question or two, and then left the matter to the judge. The salary he received amounted to about £10 for every day of the sixty days per year he was in attendance. Not content with this, the Commissioners went still further, and the witness at last wound up by saying that the business of the court went on just as well without him as with him; in fact, at that moment he had been absent from both two months, but, of course, that did not affect the salary.

"TO PROPOSE A NEW SOURCE OF INCOME for a Government, on the face of it, looks like charlatanerie. The theory of taxation is the best discussed part of political science, and the practice of taxation is much older than its theory." With these words the Economist opens an article headed "A New Source of Revenue," and the sequel certainly does not belie the exordium. The "new plan of raising money" proposed by the Economist simply consists in handing over the administrative part of the functions of the Court of Chancery to some Government office, and charging, a per-centage we suppose, for the work.

"There could be, say, in the Inland Revenue Office, an 'official trust' department, which should be directed by the Court to act as trustee when there was no trustee, or executor when there was no executor, and which should manage all the properties as soon as decrees respecting them were given, and as soon as the suit became administrative; this office could manage landed property, invest and sell out necessary monies, divide annual income—ininitely cheaper than a dozen lawyers ever will. And the administration of these suits might very fairly be made to yield a revenue.

The parties to these suits cannot manage the property themselves; they want a trustee, and they may fairly be asked to pay a trustee."

The proposed alteration may fairly challenge attention in either of two aspects—as it concerns the suitors, or those whose property would go to be administered by this "Official Trust" department, and as it concerns the revenue.

The article in question deals only or mainly with the latter, but the writer is obviously ignorant that under our present barbarous system of taxation of justice every stage in every cause is heavily taxed, and that to make the proposed new department more remunerative to the Exchequer than the corresponding litigation is at present the fees charged would have to be so raised as to be practically prohibitory in non-contentious cases, and in contentious cases it would still be necessary to resort to the Court, as well as to the "Official Trust," and thus the unfortunate estate would be mulcted in a double set of costs.

But then, it will be said, granting that the direct taxation of the estates so administered will be largely increased, the saving in other respects will be more than sufficient to repay this; or, as the Economist puts it, "At present the charge they pay is so enormous, and the result so bad, that they would in almost every case be glad to pay a fair sum for a tolerable result." This, however, only shows that the writer is as ill-informed on the subject of the costs of administration as on the taxation of legal proceedings. The costs of administration in a case where there is no litigation are as low as it is possible that they can be where the services of highly skilled agents are employed; and no transfer of this function to a separate department would obviate the necessity of employing, and paying, such advisers as are now required in the case suggested. Of course, every man who can do his own work at all can do it cheaper than he can get it done for him, provided only that he has nothing else to do which he has to neglect for the purpose; but there are comparatively few who could and would attend personally to the machinery of the administration of the estates managed for them, whether by the Court or by a public trustee, and practically the working of the proposed Trust would be as completely thrown on the shoulders of the lawyers as the administration of estates under the direction of the Court now is by the system complained of. Nor would the services of the profession be more cheaply obtainable under the new system than they are at present; on the contrary, it seems to us that the only thing which could be gained by the proposed change would be the necessity of attending two public offices, and of employing and paying two sets of public servants, in numerous cases where now the whole matter is transacted in and by one, and this, if a gain at all, would certainly not enure for the benefit either of the estates administered or the surplus revenue.

A POINT OF SOME IMPORTANCE, turning upon the construction of section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and the rules relating to debtors' summonses and to costs, has just been decided by Mr. Murray, one of the registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy. We give a report of the case in another column. It appeared that a creditor had served a debtor's summons upon his debtors, and they, being traders, had, within the seven days limited for the purpose by the summons, paid the amount claimed. The creditor thereupon sought to be allowed the costs of the summons against the debtor. The registrar held, and we think rightly, that he was not entitled to the costs. The registrar decided the case, as he was, of course, bound to do, upon the strict construction of the Act and rules. But the question has a wide bearing, and it is for this reason that we notice it. A contrary decision would have involved a wrong conception of the whole nature and object of the debtor's summons. The summons was not intended as a new and convenient means for the recovery of debts, but as a new and convenient test of insolvency. We pointed out when the Act was passed that there was some danger of the machinery introduced for the one purpose, that is, to test the debtor's solvency, being used for another—namely, as a means of obtaining payment of, or security for, the debt. And the object of rule 25 seems to have been to meet this objection. In such a case as the present the real issue—namely, the solvency or insolvency of the debtor, is in fact decided against the creditor. The result shows that his debtor was solvent and that the debt might have been recovered by ordinary process of law.

THE INNS OF COURT VOLUNTEER BALL took place in Lincoln's-inn Hall on Tuesday. The decorations, music and all other arrangements were excellent, and the only drawback to the enjoyment of the ball arose out of its very success. So largely was it attended, that dancing was scarcely a pleasurable exercise until about one a.m., when the departures began to thin the throng appreciably.

THE INDEFATIGABLE CHURCH ASSOCIATION are about to apply to the Privy Council for the appointment of a new promoter in the suit of Elphinstone v. Purchas, in the place of the late Colonel Elphinstone. The application will be opposed by the defendant, who will contend that the suit has abated by the death of the promoter and that there is no machinery by which it can be revived. The "office of the ordinary," according to him, is not of such a public character that its promotion can be continued after the person originally promoting it has died, at all events where the promoter is the appellant and dies pending the appeal. The matter, which, we believe, is prime impressionis, will be argued on Monday before the Judicial Committee.

LAW-MAKING.

Earl Grey recently, while arguing in the House of Lords that Parliament should not be encumbered with the task of framing rules for carrying out the details under the Judicature Bill, took occasion to express his hearty disapprobation of modern Acts of Parliament. "In the earlier history of Parliament," said the noble lord, "it confined itself to the substance of legislation, leaving it to the judges to embody its wishes in statutes. He believed those earlier Acts thus deliberately framed out of Parliament compared advantageously with Acts passed under the modern system, under which Parliament took cognisance of every detail and wording."

Judges and lawyers are tired of pointing out new absurdities and incomprehensibilities in the fruits of our annual legislation; suitors as a rule do not often understand the why and wherefore of an issue of law, otherwise they would declare themselves very weary of paying for judicial solutions of question after question which never ought to have been open. The fact is that our Acts of Parliament are turned out in a style of slovenliness which if it were the fault of the corrector of the press would cause Messrs. Spottiswoode to inflict his instant dismissal. A gross instance has just been before the public in an Act of the present Session (the Judges Jurisdiction Act) the principal section of which positively contains no enacting words. Fortunately, judges when they meet with incomprehensible grammar in an Act of Parliament may take refuge in the obvious intention of the Act, but that is no excuse for Parliament. Let us take one or two more instances.

An Act was passed last year for the protection of sea-fowl during the breeding season. This Act very consistently prohibits all "attempts" (whether successful or unsuccessful) at killing or taking birds during the close season; and immediately afterwards fixes the penalty at per bird killed, taken or found in the offender's possession. In consequence of which it is very difficult to see any practical check on bad shots and persons who fire at long ranges.

Still more ridiculous is the second half of the "tippling" section of the County Court Act (1868). This section is expressly directed, not to the making it inconvenient to the tipplers to buy the drink—for appeals of this kind to them have been found useless—but to the rendering it not worth while, in the seller's interest, to supply drink on credit to needy drunkards; the section according is intended to destroy the obligation of any promise to pay. And the result of the phraseology employed to this end is that if a tippler leaves his watch at the bar of a public-house in pawn for a glass of beer, the landlord may refuse to let him redeem it, and the owner has no remedy.

Take, again, the 6th section of the Regulation of Workshops Acts (30 & 31 Vict. c. 146):—

"No young person or woman shall be employed in any handicraft during any period of twenty-four hours for more than twelve hours, with intervening periods for taking meals and rest amounting, in the whole, to not less than one hour and a-half, and such employment shall take place only between the hours of five in the morning and nine at night."

We will assume that the Legislature, in passing this section, did not intend the logical sequence of the words used—viz., that employment for twelve hours, with interval of one hour and a-half or more, should be forbidden, while employment for twelve hours with interval of less than one hour and a-half should not be forbidden. But when this is postulated so many uncertainties remain in the interpretation of this unhappy sentence that it is almost impossible to apply it (vide 12 S. J. 131).

The County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act of 1865 contained two blunders so gross that the Legislature had to interfere for its amendment; and even then the amending section itself contained a blunder which neutralised half the amending power.

The unhappy 153rd section of the Companies Act, 1862, is too well-known to lawyers to require our dwelling on it. It will be sufficient to say that its insane ambiguity must have cost the public many score thousands of pounds in costs of litigation.

The Investment of Trust Funds Act (1867) was framed, apparently, in a total disregard of the circumstance that the East India Company having ceased to exist, East India Stock had never since been fresh created. There was consequently a doubt whether this Act would protect a trustee investing in the "India Stock" created subsequently to the dissolution of the company, and the Master of the Rolls was obliged to solve this doubt, at the expense of the first trust fund which came before him.

No lawyer, again, needs to be reminded of the irreconcilable jumble of the Judgment Acts, the latest of which imposed on the judges a puzzle which none of them has ever succeeded in unriddling—viz., how an incorporeal hereditament, a reversion, or an equity of redemption in land can be "actually delivered in execution." "I think," said Sir G. Giffard, mildly, before rehearsing a few of the incomprehensibilities of the Act, "that the Act of Parliament is ill-constructed; and it is much to be regretted that those who constructed it did not take some counsel before it was framed; but it is pretty obvious that they did not know what the effect would be" (Guest v. Cambridge Railway Company, 17 W. R. 8).

Take, again, another statute with which every lawyer is familiar. Locke King's Act, as the reader knows, provided for the adjustment of incumbrances on land as between the real and personal representatives of persons dying after 1854; but the Act was so vaguely and clumsily phrased that its meaning was continually in litigation, and judges differed widely as to its interpretation. After thirteen years of doubt and contradictory interpretation the inconvenience grew so intolerable that an explanatory Act was passed, to put an end to those expensive doubts. It might at least have been expected that this latter Act would not have created any fresh ones; but, unfortunately, its framers chose to employ the word "testator," whereas the framers of the original Act had used the comprehensive phrase "deceased person." Consequently the question arose,—Did this explanatory Act include the case of an intestacy? Vice-Chancellor Wickens, in a case of Evans v. Poole, decided by him in the Lancaster Chancery Court on May 14, held that an intestacy was within the intention of these "ill-expressed" Acts; but the parties have had to pay the costs of the Legislature's blunder.

We might multiply instances ad infinitum, but there is no object in quoting any more absurdities. The foregoing are enough to justify Lord Campbell's remark about the time of the judges being "consumed in making sense of other people's nonsense." Many of these legislative miscarriages,—like a certain celebrated prohibitory section under which one-half the penalty is to go to the Crown, and the other half to the informer, the penalty provided in another section being two years' imprisonment,—are obviously and ludicrously wrong within the comprehension of the lay public. Others, like those in the Judgments or County Court Acts come only under the notice of practitioners. In the result justice is withheld, litigation and costs are necessitated, and a good deal of the blame is thrown on the lawyers, who certainly are not responsible for the shortcomings of Parliament.

The blunders arise from two sources—original bad drafting, and amendments in committee. Bills introduced by private members are often characterised by a great ignorance of the existing laws affecting their subjects. The Government Bills, on the contrary, are drafted by a staff competently informed in this important respect; but, even with this department systematically at work, too much loose language creeps in. There is some gentleman on the Parliamentary draftsmen's staff (we suspect him of being Mr. Thring himself) who commits now and then very unhappy figures of speech. The section in the Companies Act which we noticed above was one of this gentleman's productions. As to the errors produced in the amending process, it is very easy to understand how they creep in wherever a bill is much "cut about." The ridiculous mistake in the Judges Jurisdiction Act is an instance in point.

In the old days of the middle ages it was thought sufficient if the statute law proclaimed in the tersest language the motif of the addition made to the law, leaving details entirely to the executive. If a practice was to be prohibited, it was sufficient if the statute forbade in terms the doing of some act representing the practice as a type; and the penalty was either left unmentioned, as a thing which "va sans dire," or provided for by a general announcement that transgressors would be "grievously amerced," or the like. This bare simplicity would be, of course, unsuited to the complex conditions of modern civilisation; but surely modern civilisation ought to be able to produce consistent and intelligible laws for its own regulation. Even Sir Edward Coke, in his time, hitting off a drawback which has since increased a hundredfold, complained of the numbers of questions arising often times out of—

"Acts of Parliament overladen with provisos and additions, and many times on a sudden penned or corrected by men of none, or very little, judgment in law."

And again—

"If Acts of Parliament were after the old fashion penned, and by such only as properly knew what the common law was before the making of any Act of Parliament concerning that matter, as also how far forth former statutes had provided remedy for former mischiefs and defects discovered by experience; then should very few questions in law arise, and the learned should not so often and so long perplex their heads to make atonement and peace by construction of law between insensible and disagreeing words, sentences, and provisos as they now do."

What would the great Chief Justice say if he could see some of our modern legislation?

We do not want now-a-days to recur to the old arrangement which ceased about the time of Henry VI., under which, after the dissolution of Parliament, the judges drafted the statutes for all the petitions which were to be granted. Such a plan would be wholly impracticable now-a-days, although that which was its great drawback while it lasted, the trucking of the judges to the supreme executive power in the State, is no longer to be apprehended. But it is plain that the present state of things needs some remedy. We drew attention to the evil two years ago, and we mention it again in the hope that it may at length engross public attention. It has already been considered in the writings of Mr. John Stuart Mill. We do not wish to see any reform unduly curtailing the individual independence of our representatives. Those bills which are introduced by the Government for the time being are already provided for by a staff of draftsmen, and although the present staff do not discharge their function over well, that is no objection to the system; but beyond this two things are much needed. First some means of assistance available for private introducers of bills; and secondly, some additional revision of amended measures.

SALE IN ENGLAND OF ARTICLES MADE ABROAD BY THE PATENTED PROCESS AN INFRINGEMENT.

The Statute of Monopolies (21 Jac. I., c. 3), which by setting a limit to the prerogative of the Crown in that respect may be regarded as the basis of our modern patent law, after declaring that all monopolies shall be void, provides (section 6) that such declaration shall not extend to any letters patent and grants of privilege, for the term of fourteen years or under, of the sole working or making of any manner of new manufacture within the realm to the true and first inventor of such manufactures, which others at the time of making such letters patent and grants shall not use, so as also they be not contrary to the law, nor mischievous to the State by raising prices of commodities at home, or hurt of trade, or generally inconvenient. Although the words of the statute are "working or making" only, it was the intention of the Legislature to prohibit third persons from using the patented article for purposes of profit by selling the same (Per Erle, C.J., in Walton v. Lavater, 8 C. B. N. S. 162), and it is now regarded as too clear for argument that the exclusive right of a patentee to make and use the patented article carries with it the exclusive right to sell the same, and that the patentee has a right to prohibit the vending in this country of articles made in this country according to his process, even, it would seem, where such articles are made as samples only, and nothing more than the offer for sale is proved in evidence (Orley v. Holden, 8 C. B. N. S. 666, 8 W. R. 626). "If the defendants" Tindal, C.J., observed in Gibson v. Brand (4 M. & G. 179), "have themselves sold an article of exactly the same fabric, made in the same manner, as that for which the patent was taken out, such sale may be considered as a user of the invention." Where indeed the letters patent empowered the plaintiff to make, use, exercise, and vend his invention, and prohibited that any others should make, use, or put in practice the same, it was held that the mere offering for sale under the particular circumstances of the case was no infringement (Minter v. Williams, 4 A. & E. 251). But this decision went on the pleadings, and does not appear to us to affect the general principle that an offer for sale is an infringement of the patent right. The word "monopoly" means the exclusive privilege of selling an article; and it would be strange if the owner of the exclusive right to make in England a particular article by a patent process had not by implication the exclusive right to sell the same in England when made, without which, indeed, the former privilege would be of little value.

There is a further question, which arose in the recent case of Elmslie v. Boursier (18 W. R. 665, L. R. 9 Eq. 217), namely, whether the importation and sale in England of articles manufactured abroad, according to the specification of an English patent, is an infringement. This question is one, to English patentees at any rate, of almost equal importance with the former. In Elmslie v. Boursier the plaintiff's case, in substance, was, that tin-foil, manufactured by the patented process in France, where the defendant possessed the exclusive privilege of so doing, had been consigned by him to England, for sale, and the Court held that this was a breach of the privilege vested in the plaintiff under his letters patent, which ought to be restrained by injunction. Introducing the article from abroad is, in fact, a species of "working or making," to which the Act applies.

It will be observed that Elmslie v. Boursier was the case of a patented process. A patent may be either for a process, or for a product, as in the leading case of Betts v. Neilson, to which we mean presently to refer. It was contended in Elmslie v. Boursier that the defendant, possessing as he did an indisputable right to manufacture in France by the patented process, might import and sell the products in England, without infringing the plaintiff's privilege, which extended to the process only, which was not infringed by user here. There is Mr. Hindmarch's authority for this argument (Law of Patent Privileges, p. 492), but it had no influence with the Vice-Chancellor, who considered that to allow articles thus manufactured to be sold in England, would be a short way of destroying "every profit, benefit, commodity, and advantage" which the patentee might otherwise draw from his monopoly.

In a case of Hancock v. Somerville, which is referred to in Goodyear v. Central Railroad of New Jersey, Fisher Pat. Cas. (Amer.) 626, as an authority, the Court of Common Pleas in June, 1851, appears to have decided that the sale of india-rubber articles in England, manufactured abroad by Goodyear, was an infringement of Hancock's patent rights, as an original independent inventor, though Goodyear's process was exactly the same as Hancock's in all respects, and prior in point of date. This case seems very much in point with respect to Elmslie v. Boursier. The American Courts on the other hand, taking a strict view of what the grant of letters patent confers, have held that the sale or use of the product of a patented machine is no violation of the privilege of the patentee, which is conferred to the exclusive right to sell or use the machine itself (Goodyear v. Central Railroad of New Jersey, ubi sup.).

In a case like Elmslie v. Boursier much will depend on the nature of the product. The burden lies on the patentee of establishing that the product, the sale of which he complains of, was manufactured by his process, and that, even if possible, will not be easy, where the article is one which, like flour for example, bears on the face of it no trace of the process by which it was manufactured.

In Walton v. Lavater the patent was for a product, not for a process. In that case the defendant, after assigning away both moieties of the patent of which he was the owner, imported from France, where he had the privilege of manufacturing them, large quantities of the patented articles with his name stamped on them, which he sold in his shop in London. It was held, as might be expected, that the sale in this country of the patented article made in France and imported, was an infringement of the plaintiff's privilege as assignee of the English patent.

In Betts v. Neilson (16 W. R. 524, L. R. 3 Ch. 429) capsules made of lead and tin united by pressure were the subject of the patent, which did not extend to Scotland, and the plaintiff's case was, that capsuled bottled beer—the capsules being made according to his process—was sent by the defendants, a Scotch firm of brewers, to their agents in England, by whom it was shipped to various foreign and colonial ports. It will be seen that the patented material was not dealt with in any way during its transit through England; yet the Court held that, since the capsules, during the time of the bottles being in England, were answering the purpose for which they were intended, of preserving the liquor, there was an user of the invention in England which ought to be restrained. The case establishes this proposition, that where the subject of a patent in England is made in a foreign country, and applied to the purpose for which it was made, and under these circumstances is sent to this country for transmission to another foreign country, this is a sufficient user of the patent in England to constitute an infringement. There is no distinction between an active use and a passive use of the thing, as was contended in Betts v. Neilson. The instant that the thing comes to be employed for the purpose for which it was designed within the limits of the patent a case of infringement arises, whether the thing be simply let alone as in Betts v. Neilson, or in actual operation as in Caldwell v. Vanvliissingen (9 Ha. 415). In Caldwell v. Vanvliissingen, a screw propeller, which was the subject of a patent in England only, was used in a Dutch vessel which happened to come into one of our ports for purposes of trade, and it was held that the use of this propeller in English water by the owner of the vessel, though in ignorance of the patentee's right, was an infringement of the patentee's right which ought to be restrained by injunction. This case led to the enactment of section 26 of the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852, which provides that letters patent granted after the passing of the Act are not to prevent the use of inventions in foreign ships resorting to British ports, except ships of foreign states in whose ports British ships are prevented from using foreign inventions.

We have now gone over the principal cases which bear on the subject of this article. The proposition that the importation and sale in England of articles manufactured abroad by a process which is the subject of an English patent is an infringement of that patent may appear almost of course, yet we have seen that it has not been established without a struggle, and that an American court is still of the contrary opinion. Logically speaking, where a process is the subject of a patent, the patent confers nothing but the exclusive right to use the particular process. "If a patentee has invented an improved lace machine, the sale of a machine made according to the patentee's invention would be an infringement; but the sale of lace made by means of the patent machine, would be no infringement; for the patentee's invention is the art of making the improved lace machine, and that art is not used, within the meaning of the patent, by a person who merely uses the machine to produce a piece of lace" (Hindmarch, p. 492). This, as we have seen, is the American view also. The Vice-Chancellor, in Elmslie v. Boursier, took a more liberal, if less logical, view, of what is comprised in the grant of a patent privilege, and held that the obtaining from abroad and selling in this country an article manufactured according to the plaintiff's process, was a violation of his privilege, though manufactured in a country whither the plaintiff's privilege did not extend.

On the 16th ult. Lord Penzance gave judgment on the will of the late Mr. Samuel Holland Moreton, solicitor, of Liverpool. Mr. Moreton, who was a Roman Catholic, had property to the value of about £15,000, and by will dated the 23rd of March, 1869, he left the whole of it to Dr. Goss, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Liverpool, "absolutely for his own use and free from any trust," and appointed Dr. Goss sole executor. Hedded between two and three o'clock a.m., of the 24th of March, 1869, being then seventy years of age. He left a widow, but no near relatives. The widow, in the first instance, disputed the will, but abandoned her opposition on Dr. Goss making a compromise with her. The will was prepared by a Roman Catholic priest, named Fisher, who is Dr. Goss's vicar, and was attested by him and the testator's servant. The signature being very unlike the testator's writing, Lord Penzance, observing that the dying man's hand might have been guided, without the supposition involving fraud, pronounced against the will, on the ground that he was not satisfied that the testator was in a fit condition to make a will at the time.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

DISAPPEARANCE FOR SEVEN YEARS—PRESUMPTION OF DEATH.

Re Phene's Trusts, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 303, L. R. 5 Ch. 139.

The effect of the decision of the Lord Justice on this appeal is to overrule the cases of Thomas v. Thomas, 13 W. R. 225, decided by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, and the recent decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins in Re Benham's Trusts, 15 W. R. 741, and to affirm the principle of Doe v. Nepean, 5 B. & Ad. 86, and the older cases, that the conclusion of a man's death at the end of a seven years' disappearance is a matter of presumption, but that when he died is not a matter of presumption but a question of evidence to be proved by the person whose title depends on the fact of death having taken place before a particular period. Vice-Chancellor James, from whom the appeal in Re Phene's Trusts was taken to the Lord Justice, has expressed his disapproval of, while feeling himself bound by, the cases of Thomas v. Thomas and Re Benham's Trusts. As we have already stated, when the death took place is a matter of evidence, not of presumption, and it may be added as a necessary requisite, that the person who claims on the strength of death at any particular period must prove it, he being the person upon whom the burden of proof is thrown (Re Green's Settlement, 14 W. R. 192, L. R. 1 Eq. 288). Now Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, in at least three cases (Lambe v. Orton, 8 W. R. 111; Dunn v. Snowden, 11 W. R. 160; and Thomas v. Thomas) held that the question, when did death take place, was one of presumption, in the absence of evidence; and that the presumption was that death occurred at the end of the seven years. Vice-Chancellor Malins in Re Benham's Trusts, adopted this view of the law with the consequence, which in a manner flows from it, that, as at the end of the seven years you must presume for the first time that the man was dead; so you must also presume that within that period, and up to the end of it, he was alive. This is inconsistent with the law, as laid down by Lord Denman in Doe v. Nepean, and adopted in Nepean v. Wright (2 M. & W. 914; see Rez v. Inhabitants of Harborne, 2 A. & E. 540). The Lord Justice followed the latter authorities, and held that at what time within the seven years the person died is not a matter of presumption but of evidence, and that the burden of proving that the death took place at any particular period within the seven years lies on the person whose title depends on that fact being established. We need only add that the authorities are collected in the judgment.

DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE—WIFE'S RIGHTS OF PROPERTY.

Swift v. Wenman, M.R., 18 W. R. 480.

It seems singular that none of the Divorce Acts enable the Divorce Court to deal with the property of the parties after a decree of dissolution. In the case of a judicial separation it is expressly enacted (20 & 21 Vict., c. 85, s. 25) that the wife is thenceforth to be considered as a feme sole with respect to property which she may acquire, or which may come to or devolve upon her; and this section has been held to extend to property not reduced into possession at the date of the order (Johnson v. Lander, 17 W. R. 272, c. 27, Eq. 228); and the nature and effect of a protection order, which may now be granted by the Judge Ordinary (21 & 22 Vict., c. 108, s. 7) are well understood. But in a case of dissolution, the Divorce Court is not empowered to deal with the settled property (22 & 23 Vict., c. 61, s. 5) unless where not only the status of parent has been acquired (Corrance v. Corrance & Lon, 16 W. R. 893), but a child of the marriage is actually in existence at the date of the application (Graham v. Graham & Griffith, 17 W. R. 628).

In Swift v. Wenman there was no issue of the marriage, and consequently the Divorce Court possessed no jurisdiction to make any order with reference to Mrs. Swift's settlement. This settlement seems to have been of the usual character, with an ultimate trust for Mrs. Swift in case of the death of her husband in her lifetime without issue of the marriage. The Court ordered the fund to be transferred to her notwithstanding the settlement, on the ground that the decree of dissolution annihilated the marriage contract, and was equivalent to the death of the husband.

The ratio decidendi was the same as in Wells v. Mallbon, 10 W. R. 364, where a married woman became entitled to a share of residue, and before it was reduced into possession by her husband, the marriage was dissolved, and the Master of the Rolls decided that she and not her husband was entitled to the fund. The consequences of dissolution as to the property of the parties were much considered in Wilkinson v. Gibson (15 W. R. 983, L. R. 4 Eq. 162), where the wife was at the date of the decree entitled to a reversionary interest in a fund which fell into possession afterwards, and on the husband claiming it as against the executor of the wife, it was held that the husband having failed to reduce it into possession during the coverture, the executor was entitled. It will be remembered that a decree of dissolution operates from the date of the decree nisi (Prole v. Soady, 16 W. R. 445), and that, therefore, a husband cannot reduce his wife's choses in action into possession during the interval between the decree nisi and the decree becoming absolute.

COMMON LAW.

RAILWAY COMPANY—"ORDINARY LUGGAGE"—SERVANT TAKING MASTER'S LUGGAGE.

Beecher v. Great Eastern Railway Company, Q.B., 18 W. R. 627.

This is one of a sufficiently large class of cases which show the inconvenience of the system universally adopted on English railways of allowing passengers to take only a certain weight of—on some lines "ordinary luggage," on others "personal luggage." This is usually regulated by the special Acts of the different companies, which specify the weight and the kind of luggage which each passenger is to be allowed to take with him.

The consequence of this system is that if a passenger's luggage is lost he cannot recover any compensation for the loss unless it is either "ordinary" or his "personal" luggage, as the case may be. A moment's reflection will show that a very great quantity of luggage is every day carried by passengers on railways, and properly and necessarily so carried by them, which does not come within the term "personal" or "ordinary" luggage. For instance, no article not belonging to the passenger himself comes within these terms, and he therefore cannot recover if such articles are lost, nor can the owner of the article, as the railway company in such a case never contracted to carry the article, and therefore are not responsible for its loss. The last case on the subject, prior to the one we are now noticing, was Hudston v. Midland Railway Company (17 W. R. 705), where it was held that a spring-horse for a child to ride on, which a passenger carried with him for his children, was not either "personal" or "ordinary" luggage. Lush, J., there says that ordinary luggage means luggage "ordinarily and usually carried by passengers as their luggage." There have been besides a good many other cases on this question.

In Beecher v. Great Eastern Railway Company, a servant travelling without his master, took his master's luggage to London by the defendants' line. Under the defendants' Act each passenger was entitled to take with him a specified weight of "his ordinary luggage." The luggage in question was lost, and in an action by the master against the company for the loss, it was held that he could not recover, as he had made no contract concerning the luggage with the defendants. It would seem also that the servant could not have recovered either, because the defendants only contracted with him to take "his ordinary luggage," which would not include his master's luggage.

The object, of course, of restricting passengers to ordinary or personal luggage is to prevent merchandise and other things, not bona fide luggage, being carried by passengers as their own luggage without any additional payment. This, however, under the present system is constantly done whenever passengers choose to do so. The only consequence of so doing is the possibility of not being able to recover its value if lost; but this is not a probable contingency in any given case, and the rule constantly causes loss to persons whose luggage, although not merchandise of any kind, nor belonging to other people, does not come within the meaning of the kind of luggage allowed to be carried.

We have before suggested that a far more convenient plan would be to allow each passenger a certain fixed weight of luggage, irrespective of its nature, as is done on many of the continental lines. It is reasonable that the company should not be under the serious liability of being liable to compensate for the loss of very valuable articles, such as jewelry, &c.; but companies are already protected in this respect by the Carriers Act (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 68), and, if necessary, the principle of this statute might be extended still further, or a maximum amount might be fixed, beyond which the company should not in any case be liable. The only possible objection to the system we suggest is, that goods might be carried under the name of personal luggage. This, however, is now done to a considerable extent, and we doubt whether there would be any appreciable increase of the amount of merchandise thus carried. The alteration would be a great convenience for travellers, and it would not injure the railway companies.

NEGLIGENCE—CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS—IMPLIED WARRANTY.

Francis v. Cockrell, Q.B., 18 W. R. 668.

Readhead v. The Midland Railway Company decided that a carrier of passengers does not impliedly warrant the roadworthiness of his carriages, and therefore that if a passenger is injured in consequence of a carriage being not roadworthy the carrier is not liable for such injury if the badness of the carriage has not been caused by negligence. This decision does not affect in any way the rule that common carriers of goods are insurers of the goods against everything except the act of God and the King's enemies. It affirms also the liability of carriers of passengers for the consequences of their own negligence, but leaves one question open—viz., whether a railway company would be liable if a carriage is so negligently made by a manufacturer as to be not roadworthy and the company purchase it, and without negligence use the carriage for the conveyance of passengers and a passenger is injured in consequence of the badness of the carriage. It is clear that if the company had manufactured the carriage they would be liable because they would have caused the injury by their negligence, and Readhead's case decided that if no one is negligent the company would not be liable. The intermediate case of negligence in a manufacturer has now been decided in Francis v. Cockrell, where it was held that the carrier would be liable for the negligence of the manufacturer in the same way that he is liable for his own negligence. In other words, Francis v. Cockrell decides that the contract between a passenger and carrier contains an implied warranty that due care has been used in the construction of the carriage in which the passenger travels. If from any want of such due care the passenger is injured, he is entitled to maintain an action against the carrier.

Although this is strictly the decision in Francis v. Cockrell, the plaintiff was not a passenger, nor was the defendant a carrier. The defendant with others had caused to be erected, by a competent contractor, a stand on a race-course, and received for the purposes of the race the money paid by persons admitted to the stand. The plaintiff amongst others paid for and used the stand, which was in fact negligently constructed, but not so to the knowledge of the defendant. The stand broke and the plaintiff fell and was injured. There was no negligence on the part of the defendant, but he was held liable to the plaintiff on the principle that he must be taken to have warranted that the stand was properly erected. As the stand was not properly erected there was a breach of this contract, for the natural and probable consequences of which the defendant was liable. The Court arrived at this decision from the close analogy between this and the case of a carrier of passengers. They notice Readhead's case, and that this particular point, viz., liability for negligence of a contractor, is there left undecided. They then held that a passenger could maintain an action against a carrier for an injury sustained through defects in a carriage caused solely by the negligence of an independent manufacturer, and then that "the same reasoning which is applicable to the case of a carrier of passengers is applicable to the case of a person who, like the defendant, provides places for spectators at races or other exhibitions." There was some considerable doubt on the authorities as to this point, but the Court were of opinion that the right of authority as well as reasons of justice and convenience were on the plaintiff's side.

The decision in Francis v. Cockrell will apply probably most directly to carriers of passengers. It may have, however, besides a very wide application to many cases that are not touched upon in the judgment. For instance, it may be asked will the principle be applied at all in considering the obligations arising from the contract of sale, as if A. negligently manufactures a rope which is defective and unfit for use, but such defect cannot be ascertained by any inspection. B. buys the rope believing it sound, and sells it to C. who uses it and is injured in consequence of this latent defect. Has C. a remedy against B.? Again, will the decision affect the liability of masters to their servants, as if a master without negligence supplies to his servants machinery or materials which are unfit for use from the neglect of the manufacturer and an accident is thereby caused in which the servant is injured. Many other cases of this sort might be suggested which the principle of Francis v. Cockrell may possibly affect.

REVIEWS.

Lawyers and Doctors; Orphans and Guardians: A plea for the better Legislative Protection of Medical Men and Helpless Patients: The Law of Medical Fees and a Scheme for Appointing Medical Assessors. By DAVID READ. London: Hardwicke.

Pamphlets published to ventilate personal grievances are seldom read. Everyone shuns them with even greater aversion than that awarded to advertising circulars and begging letters. In the present instance the means of ventilation takes the form of an octavo volume of 180 pages; its size will hardly be considered to improve its chance. The subject is a system of grievances arising out of the case of Sanger v. Sanger, recently in litigation in the Rolls Court. A Dr. James Clark was in medical attendance upon an infant ward of court in this case. Dr. Clark considered himself maltreated by the guardians (parties, of course, to the suit) in the matter of fees, and appealed, unsuccessfully it seems, to the Master of the Rolls in court. Hereupon, very unfortunately for Dr. Clark, his friend has performed the unfriendly act of writing 180 pages of animadversions on the case, in which citations of legal authorities, quotations of the more hackneyed portions of Shakespeare and other popular authors, extracts from shorthand notes, and abuse of everyone who has not furthered the views of Dr. Clark in the case, are mixed up in a tedious imbroglia, profusely adorned with italics and small capitals. We have some recollection of the cause, and we have also a remembrance of having thought that Dr. Clark's case was rather a hard one. If so he is all the more to be pitied for having such an ill-judging friend as the author of this volume.

COURTS.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(At Nisi Prius, before BRAMWELL, B., and a Special Jury.)
June 18.—Merriman v. Buckle.

This was an action for libel. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and a justification.

Serjt. Tindal Atkinson and Anderson, for the plaintiff, said the plaintiff was a solicitor carrying on business in Queen-street, Cheapside, and the defendant was the proprietor and editor of a monthly publication, called the Commercial World. The alleged libel was contained in an article in that journal which, it was said, imputed to the plaintiff, that being solicitor to the Hercules Insurance Company he tried to get it wound up with a view to his own personal advantage, and accused him of being a "wrecker." The plaintiff, far from wishing to bring the company to an end, had incurred considerable liability in enabling it to meet its liabilities, and it was only after being convinced that the company was hopelessly insolvent and that it would be disastrous to the shareholders to go on, that he supported the proposal to wind up. The company was now winding up, and a call of £2 per share had been made.

Morgan Howard, Grantham, and Massey, for the defendant, denied that there was any intention to charge the plaintiff with being a wrecker, and contended that the article was a fair comment on a matter of public interest, it being the belief of the writer that it would be for the interest of the shareholders that the company should continue its operations. That in the next number of the paper there had appeared a disclaimer of any imputation of improper motives to the plaintiff, and an ample apology if the article had placed an injurious construction on his acts.

BRAMWELL, B., left it to the jury to say whether the whole or any part of the article was a libel upon the plaintiff. He observed that although the article was of a very trashy character, and to some extent carried its own antidote with it, yet if they thought it was calculated to bring the plaintiff into public odium and ridicule he did not see why they should not express their disapprobation of such writing by giving reasonable damages.

Verdict for the plaintiff—damages, 40s.

Serjt. Atkinson applied for a certificate for costs, but the learned judge doubting the necessity for a certificate the question was reserved. On Monday, on the application being renewed, his lordship granted a certificate for costs and also for a special jury.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

June 10.—Re Marchant.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 72.

This case came before the Court upon an application by the trustee under the bankruptcy for an injunction restraining the sale of the debtor's property by a Mr. Spriggs, who held a bill of sale given some few days before the filing of the petition, and a declaration that the deed was void and inoperative as against the trustee, and that the goods comprised therein formed part of the estate and effects of the bankrupt. The adjudication had taken place upon petition, founded on a declaration of insolvency signed by the bankrupt on the 6th of May. The question was, whether the execution of the bill of sale constituted an act of bankruptcy, and evidence was entered upon for the purpose of showing on the one hand that the deed comprised substantially all the bankrupt's effects, and on the other that a portion of his goods were excluded from its operation. It was shown that in January of the present year the bankrupt was sued by Spriggs for the recovery of £2,000 due upon a promissory note given some time previously, and in March a judge's order was given by consent, whereby Spriggs was entitled forthwith to sign judgment against the bankrupt, but instead of issuing execution upon his judgment, Spriggs afterwards, towards the end of April, only nine days before the date of the adjudication, obtained from the bankrupt a bill of sale on his stock and effects.

The bankrupt, upon examination, said that the bill of sale included everything he had, and he did not reserve anything for his own use. From the moment possession was taken under the bill of sale he had no means of carrying on his trade.

Sargood, Serjt., and Finlay Knight, for the trustee, argued that the bill of sale amounted to a fraudulent conveyance or transfer of the bankrupt's property made for the purpose of preventing the general body of the creditors obtaining possession of it. They referred to Woodhouse v. Murray (15 W. R. 1109, L. R. 2 Q. B. 634).

De Gez, Q.C., and Reed, for Mr. Spriggs.—In the schedule to the deed numerous items were struck out, showing that it was not the bankrupt's intention to part with the whole of his property.

The CHIEF JUDGE, after stating the facts, said in this case it was abundantly clear that the bill of sale, comprising as it did the whole, or substantially the whole, of the bankrupt's property, constituted an act of bankruptcy, and was void as against creditors. There would, therefore, be a declaration that the deed was inoperative, and that the property comprised in it formed part of the bankrupt's assets.

June 16.—Re a Debtor's Summons.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 7, rule 186.

This was an application on the part of a creditor under the 186th rule for an order that certain debtors should pay the costs of a debtor's summons, the debt having been paid to the creditor within the time limited by the summons.

It appeared that the debtors were traders, and within seven days after personal service of the summons they attended at the office of the creditor's solicitor suing out the summons, and tendered to him the amount of the claim. The costs of the summons were demanded according to the scale appended to the rules, and a receipt was given for the debt without prejudice to the creditor's claim for the costs of the summons. The costs not having been paid, a four days' notice of motion was given, supported by an affidavit of the circumstances.

J. S. Salaman, solicitor, for the creditor, referred to section 7 of the Act, in which the form of the summons was stated to be similar to a common law writ, and contended it was clearly the intention of the Legislature to assimilate this much used process, which would take the place of common law writs, to that process, although there was no mention of costs in the prescribed form of summons. He contended also that, the new Court having within itself the extended power of a court of common law and a court of equity, it was only just that the debtor should pay the costs of a process to recover an undisputed debt after the creditor had proved to the satisfaction of the court that the process had become necessary because he had failed to obtain payment of his debt after using reasonable efforts to do so; these efforts consisting of a delivery of particulars, of demands, of more than one request for payment, and then another formal application for payment.

The REGISTRAR, after considering the different contentions on the part of the creditor, stated that although it might be a hardship upon creditors to have to pay their own costs, he considered he had no power to order the payment of them, as the Act and the rules were silent upon the subject, and he did not consider that rule 186 applied, because, the debt having been paid, it could not be considered that the summons was a matter before the Court. He must decide against the application, without costs.

COUNTY COURTS.

The Treasury have issued the following "Circular to Registrars" of county courts:—

"Treasury, 21st June, 1870.

Sir,—I beg leave to inform you that at page 7, line 1, of the County Court Rules, 1870, forwarded to you on the 27th of last month, the word 'registrar' has been printed by mistake for the word 'treasurer.'—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
HENRY NICOL."

COURT OF THE STANNARIES.

Re Leawood Mining Company (Stannaries of Devon), Ex parte The Imperial Bank.

Companies Act, 1862—Cost book Mining Company—Claim of creditor for personal liability of shareholders beyond their liability to the agents for the costs of working.

THE VICE-WARDEN OF THE STANNARIES delivered the following judgment:—In this case the Leawood Mining Company is under liquidation by order of this Court, and the Imperial Banking Company (Limited), a registered company, claims to be admitted to prove a debt of £99 8s. 4d., as immediate creditors of the Leawood Mining Company, which is an unregistered company, commonly called a "cost-book" company. Such companies are mere common-law companies or partnerships, and do not usually profess to have powers to charge the members of them for money borrowed for the purpose of the working of the mine. The liability of the shareholders is commonly and prima facie considered to be pledged only to pay their agents the costs of working; and petitions to compel payments of such costs, actually incurred and audited, are part of the ordinary process of this Court under the name of pursor's petitions, which seek to enforce payment by sale of so many shares of the defaulter as may suffice to cover the costs or calls in arrear; not by way of forfeiture, but by way of lien on the shares. That the shares in such mining partnerships are not by implication made directly liable for loans obtained from bankers has been now settled so long, and by so many reported cases familiar to this court and its suitors, that I will only refer to Ricketts v. Bennett, 4 C. B. 686; and this applies, not only to a "cost-book" company in Cornwall or elsewhere, but to all other common law partnerships to work a mine, except where the power to borrow is authorised by the original constitution of the company. Prima facie, a cost-book company is normally, carried on upon a "ready money principle." (Lindley on Partnerships, I., 274; also Collier on Mines, 131—154; 115, 116.) It is, I believe, contended that the special circumstances of this case warrant the banker in assuming that all the shareholders in this company either authorised the loans, or have so acquiesced in them, as to put them in the position of immediate creditors of the company—i.e., of each and every partner owning parts or shares in it. On the establishment of this company a set of special rules or regulations were signed by the first takers. This is now so common a practice, and resorted to with so little attention to the familiar principles of such mining companies, and so slender a knowledge of the general principles of the common law and of local usages, that I cannot help regretting that the term "cost-book principle" had not been at once dropped and discontinued in new unregistered companies. In some cases the new company more wisely confines itself to a general profession of the "cost-book principle, as recognised in the Stannary Court," and adds nothing more; but in the present instance, after setting out with a preliminary declaration that the mine is to be conducted "entirely on the cost-book principle," the rules proceed to add a series of twenty-two other rules, with little regard to any of the main attributes of such principle; but there is not among these any one that shows an intention to carry on the mine on the "banker's loan principle." There is indeed one (No. 22), which is a clause for making future alterations of the rules at special meetings convened for that purpose, but the books of the company show that no such special meetings were ever in fact held for such purpose; nor do I find among the seven or eight general meetings held during the continuance of the company, from April, 1864, to the 26th February, 1867, that any resolution either directed or distinctly recognised such loans. There do, indeed, appear in some of the accounts which were, or ought to have been, laid before the meetings pretty strong symptoms of such dealings, but nothing amounting to a clear concurrence in the practice. The only loans which I find in books of the company appear to be founded on applications of Mr. Murchison, the secretary, for which he may be, and probably is, himself personally liable to the bank. It is singular that none of the circular notices issued before a meeting were produced before me, so that it does not appear to me that in such notices the attention of absent shareholders was drawn to the fact that there were any such loans, or that the members of the company were debited in the gross by the bank for such loans. The provision of rule 8, that makes a majority of the shareholders present competent to bind the whole body, may not be an improper one in itself, but it certainly has a tendency to narrow the governing powers of the partnership. Practically, it throws them into the hands of the two or three shareholders who are nearest at hand, and are the resident officers of the company. At two of the six general meetings I find only three persons present, and at one I find the secretary alone was present, and considered himself such a "majority" as to bind all the shareholders. No wonder, therefore, that we find him to be the usual applicant for assistance by way of loan or overdraft. Upon the whole I feel myself unable to admit the personal claim of the bankers to stand in the position of direct creditors of the whole body of members. If the money is proved to have been actually expended on the works, a legitimate claim of those managers or members of the company that borrowed the money may possibly entitle them to become, pro tanto, creditors of the company, subject, however, to any counter-claim that may exist, as between them and the company, for calls. The bank will, of course, be at liberty to appeal against this judgment, and may perhaps reverse or vary it in such manner as the superior court shall think fit. I dismiss the claim, and confirm the previous decision of the registrar. Costs reserved for consideration.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. JOHN HOLYOAKE, solicitor, of Droitwich, Worcestershire, has been elected Clerk to the Commissioners of the Droitwich turnpike roads, in succession to Mr. John Curtler, solicitor, resigned. Mr. Holyoake was certificated in 1838, and is a perpetual commissioner for Worcestershire.

MR. E. BEAL, a London solicitor, has been appointed (by Mr. R. Nicholson, Clerk of the Peace for Hertfordshire) to be Deputy Clerk of the Peace for the county, and also for the liberty of St. Albans, in succession to the late Mr. J. A. Dorant. Mr. Beale will therefore in future reside and practice at St. Albans.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

June 17.—The Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Bill.—The Archbishop of York moved the second reading. This bill was based on a report of a joint committee of the convocations of Canterbury and York. At present there was no satisfactory mode of enforcing repairs, and it proposed that a surveyor of high position should be appointed in each diocese, who, wherever ordered, and on any presentation to a benefice, would make a survey. The bill was read a second time.

The Churchwardens Liability Bill was reported as amended, and the Archbishop of York pointed out that the terms of clause 2 exceeded the object of the measure, which he understood to be the abolition of the compulsory payment of visitation fees.—The Bishop of London deemed the bill unnecessary after the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench that churchwardens were not liable to pay these fees if they had received no funds wherewith to do so. Where rates were made there could be no objection to continuing the liability.—The Marquis of Salisbury said the dislike to those fees was frequently so great that a rate would be refused on the bare ground of their being payable out of it. The object of the bill was to relieve churchwardens from personal liability and to provide that the fees should not be paid out of a voluntary church-rate unless the vestry had so decided. He was willing on the third reading to modify the clause objected to.—Report received.

The Appellate Jurisdiction Bill.—On the motion to go into committee, Lord Westbury expressed a fear that there would be no power of rehearing, though it was sometimes necessary, in consequence of additional material, that a case should be reheard before it was taken to a court of appeal.—The Lord Chancellor said the High Court of Justice Bill conferred a power of rehearing. The bill passed through committee.

The High Court of Justice Bill.—The Lord Chancellor moved the third reading.—Lord Denman opposed, on the ground that our ancient courts should not be abolished until the rules of the proposed new tribunal were ready to be submitted to Parliament. It was useless to hurry forward this bill, since it would reach the House of Commons at the very time when its legal members were going on circuit. The amendment was negative, and the bill read a third time.—On the motion that it do pass—The Marquis of Salisbury moved to omit clause 7, as inconsistent with the understanding that, while sanctioning the principle of the fusion of law and equity, the operation of the measure should be suspended till the subsidiary arrangements had been sanctioned by Parliament. The clause reduced the salaries of several of the judges, a policy to which most statesmen had objected, and which, if adopted, ought to originate with the House of Commons. The position of our judicial bench had always been a subject of great national pride, and it was in some degree attributed to the liberality with which the distinguished men raised to it were remunerated.—The Lord Chancellor said the reduction would only operate in two cases. The Master of the Rolls not only exercised judicial duties in the Court of Chancery, but had other important functions, which Lord Romilly had so effectually discharged by the publication of the public records; but, though superior in rank to the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, his salary was £6,000 while theirs was £7,000. It was desirable, when transferring him to the appellate jurisdiction, to correct this anomaly, and the salary of the Lord Chief Justice of England would not be interfered with. The unwillingness of the late Lord Kingsdown to accept the office of Vice-Chancellor, which was attributed by Lord Romilly to the inadequacy of the salary, was owing to the possession of a considerable fortune, which induced him to give his valuable services to the Judicial Committee in preference to the Court of Chancery, where his duties would have been more unpleasant, there being the necessity of constantly attending chambers.—Lord Cairns would not repeat his objections to the clause, but having been informed that it would be struck out as soon as it left the House as a matter touching the privileges of the Commons, he objected to its being now retained for the mere purpose of intimating to the Commons that their Lordships were satisfied with the arrangement.—Lord Westbury urged the desirability of giving larger salaries to the chiefs of the different courts, in order that the other judges might be encouraged to aspire to promotion. The clause would serve no other purpose than to induce the Commons, as guardians of the public purse, to adopt the proposal, and he hoped therefore it would be struck out.—The Lord Chancellor was willing that the clause should be expunged, as well as all the money clauses which would otherwise be struck out on the bill going down to the Commons as irregular. His reason for inserting them was that he did not think it right to keep in the background any of the changes which it was proposed to make. The question, however, had better go to the Commons entirely unprejudiced, as it would there be more fully considered. The money clauses were then struck out, and the bill then passed.

The Sequestration Bill.—Report of amendments in committee.—The Bishop of Winchester said he was indebted to Lord Cairns for some amendments necessary to make the bill harmonise with the bankruptcy law; these he proposed to adopt with one alteration, for the purpose of giving effect to the view of the select committee—viz., that a clergyman should retain his living for two years after bankruptcy, to give him an opportunity of retrieving his position. The present law was unfair to creditors as well as to the clergy, for it gave an unfair advantage to the creditor who first entered judgment.—Lord Cairns said the bill would remedy the great defect of the existing law, by allowing the bishop to appropriate an unlimited portion of the income of the sequestered benefice to the spiritual necessities of the parish. It would also, however, make bankruptcy compulsory in the event of a clergyman being involved in difficulties, even though the creditors might be willing to accede to a compromise. This, he feared, would create a greater scandal than it removed, for bankruptcy would be a greater scandal than sequestration. He also objected to power being given to the bishops to declare the living void. If charged with drunkenness or immorality a clergyman was tried before the proper tribunal, from whose decision either party could appeal, the penalty being two to five years' suspension. Now, the misfortune or offence of bankruptcy was surely a more venial one, and it was not just, therefore, to empower the bishop, or, on appeal, the archbishop, acting at his pleasure, without any judicial process, to visit it with forfeiture of the benefice. He could not allow the bill to proceed without protesting against the introduction of such a system of discipline.—The amendments proposed by the Bishop of Winchester were agreed to, and the report was received.

The Union of Benefices Amendment (1870) Bill.—The report of the amendments was also received.

The Irish Land Bill.—Adjourned debate on second reading.—Lord Lurgan, as an Ulster landlord, supported the bill.—Lord Dunsany objected to the invasion of the rights of property, which he prophesied would not stop at Ireland.—Lord Leitrim said the bill would create discord and exterminate the small tenantry.—Lord Lichfield, as one who had carefully examined the bill, hoped it would pass promptly, with some amendments to prevent injustice, litigation and sub-division of holdings.—Lord Clancarty approved the principle of preventing capricious eviction; but the bill would want copious amendments.—Lord Powerscourt, as one connected both with Ulster and the South, believed the bill would restrain the oppressive without injuring the just.—Lord Portarlington said capricious evictions must be legislated against, but the bill contained many mischievous provisions.—Lord Lansdowne said this just and generous bill would give the occupier increased security and self-reliance.—Lord Carnarvon anticipated a good result from the bill, but he disapproved of the purchase clauses. The bill did not propose fixity of tenure, and Ireland, to become a prosperous country, must submit to the laws.—The Lord Chancellor said the bill was in harmony with the rights of property and every principle of law and justice. The almost universal testimony of those who had taken part in the debate was that the bill did no more than was already done by every good landlord. If the bill were substantially changed in a landlord sense, and if it failed to pacify Ireland, it would do more harm than good. If, on the other hand, the bill was allowed to have its full and due effect, it would show how earnestly the people of England desired to place the people of Ireland on the same footing of peace and tranquillity with themselves.—Lord Oranmore's opposition not being pressed, the bill was read the second time.

June 20.—The Union of Benefices (1870) Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

June 22.—The Married Women's Property Bill.—Lord Cairns moved the second reading. While necessarily dealing with the position as to property of married women in general, its main object was to meet the case of married women in the humbler classes, especially those who were in the habit of working for wages or acquiring earnings for the support of themselves and families. Poor and industrious women, who had exerted themselves to maintain their families, had their small earnings pounced upon from time to time by intemperate, idle, or dissolute husbands, for purposes entirely foreign to the support of the family. The reason was that the common law vested in the husband all the wife's personal property, a rule so inconvenient in practice that, wherever the amount of property justified it, it was modified by settlements, making special provision for the wife. The Court of Chancery, moreover, had very extensively and beneficially modified the rule even where there was no settlement, where the amount of property justified its interference, and where that interference could be invoked. Its temper had always been to insist that the greater or an adequate portion of such property should be settled on the wife and children. While the upper classes were protected against the absolute rule of common law by means of settlements and the interposition of the Court of Chancery, the humbler classes had no protection except that provided at the instance of Lord St. Leonards in the Divorce Act, which empowered a magistrate to grant an order to a wife deserted by her husband, protecting her future earnings against his interference. This was obviously insufficient, for the hardest cases were those where the husband did not desert his wife, but clung to her for the sole purpose of plundering her from time to time of her earnings. In all continental countries laws had been adopted more favourable to married women, and the United States and Canada had introduced legislation similar to or in the direction of the present bill. Three remedies had been proposed for the evil. First, an extension of the system of protection orders, but these, at present, did not reach the worst cases, and it was unwise to require a poor working woman, as a condition of protection, to present herself in a police-court for the purpose, as it were, of effecting a separation of interests, and of suggesting a complaint against her husband, thereby provoking that want of domestic harmony which it should be the object to avoid. Secondly, a statutable form of settlement, applying to all cases where the parties did not themselves enter into a settlement. The women of the lower classes, however, did not want a settlement, which was quite unsuitable to small sums. The third and only remaining course was that proposed by the bill—viz., to alter the general rule of law, to leave settlements to be made where advisable, but in other cases to make the property of the married woman her own until she chose to part with it. If she pleased she might make a gift of it to her husband. Thus the bill would do for the poor what the court of equity did for the rich, by putting the married woman as to property in the same position as the unmarried. Some of its provisions would require consideration, and he himself should propose such amendments, but after the best consideration his opinion was that the principle of the bill was the true one. It had passed the House of Commons two or three times, and was there investigated by a select committee, when evidence was taken, and he believed there was in that House a strong preponderance of opinion in its favour. It was last year read a second time in this House on the understanding that it should not then proceed further, and he should offer no objection to its being referred to a select committee, where some of the niceties of law which it involved might possibly be better considered, and where, owing to its moderate compass, it would occupy but a short time.—Lord Penzance said the bill went far beyond the necessities of the case, for it affected all the married women of England; it would subvert the principles on which the marriage relations had hitherto stood, and its tendency would be to cause increased discord and separation. The bill would give a married woman the same right of possessing and dealing with property, and of contracting obligations with third persons that an unmarried woman enjoyed, while it nevertheless left untouched her right to be maintained by her husband. She would be able to spend her property if and how she liked, without any obligation of contributing to the expenses of the household, and when it was dissipated she would be entitled to support and to pledge her husband's credit for the necessities of life. She might sue and be sued like a feme sole, and there was nothing to prevent her bringing an action against her husband founded upon any matter of contract which she might choose to allege. A husband who expected his wife to keep his home and attend to the children might find her opening a Berlin wool shop with her cousin John as a partner. Surely this was an unnecessary corollary to the protection of women's earnings from idle and dissolute husbands? The common law, broken in upon in the case of settlements, provided that, the wife having no personal property of her own, the husband should have the regulation of the common purse. It was desirable to set up in a household two holders of the purse, two powers, co-equal at first, and likely to be adverse in the end. His special experience had shown him that there was no commoner cause of violence and cruelty, leading to a separation, than the possession of some small sum by the wife which she was in some way able to retain, the result being that the husband first teased and afterwards ill-treated her in order to get hold of it. The bill involved the question whether the husband should rule in his own household. No doubt the property of a woman about to marry was settled (but settled as much to protect it from being spent by her as by the husband) on the children, and in by far the larger number of cases a life interest in it was given to the husband, subject to pin-money. The French law gave the option of community or separation of property, but the former was chosen in 99 cases out of 100. It gave the husband the entire regulation of the expenditure of the common fund, simply requiring an account from him when the community was put an end to, and where this step was necessary, on account of the husband's misconduct, the wife had to go before a court of justice and obtain séparation de biens. This was a system which met the necessities of the case. Why should the wife not be able to appear before a county court judge, who, on sufficient proof that the husband was idle, dissolute, or disorderly, would undo the community of goods affixed to marriage by the common law, thus leaving to her her own earnings? The protection orders provided by the Divorce Act were obtained with the utmost facility from any magistrate or from the judge of the Divorce Court on a short affidavit, and they worked extremely well. Why should they not be extended to cases other than those of desertion?—Lord Westbury said the bill had sprung from the sensationalism which delighted in extravagances, and which had applied those notions to the amendment of the law. It would subvert the domestic rule which had existed in this country for more than a thousand years. It proposed that a married woman should be capable of holding, acquiring, alienating, devising, and bequeathing real and personal estate. The object of legislation should be to make a man and his wife one soul and one spirit, and to devote their property entirely to the benefit of themselves and their children; but the bill had quite an opposite tendency. The bill would enable a married woman to dispose of leasehold houses or railway shares in any manner she chose, and if there was some person for whom she had greater affection than for her legitimate lord, she might lavish the proceeds upon him. A woman of the labouring class would be frequently subjected to the temptation of buying expensive articles by pedlars and others. She would be summoned to the county court for payment, and if the order of the Court were disobeyed the judge would have power of imprisonment. Was it desirable to expose such a woman to a temptation to which she would certainly yield, as she had done from the beginning, and then to put her in prison? But the law which gave the wife's real and personal property to the husband should be altered. The property might be invested, the husband having the management and administration of the income, and being controller of his household until he made a bad use of that power. As to property accruing after marriage, it should, if it exceeded a certain sum, be settled for the benefit of the wife and children, including also, if they pleased, the husband. As the bill stood the wife would be under no obligation of contributing to the maintenance of the establishment, her only liability being to pay the parish perhaps 5s. a week if her husband became chargeable to the parish, while his obligation to support her was left untouched. The best course would be to reject the bill and substitute for it one with reasonable provisions which would probably have some chance of passing both Houses. The passing of the present bill was out of the question.—Lord Romilly said that, if the bill were carefully reformed by a select committee, the House of Commons, he believed, would cheerfully accept it as a measure improved by noble lords who had paid attention to the subject.—The Earl of Shaftesbury recognised the need of protection to married women's property, but the bill went far beyond what was necessary, and struck at the root of domestic happiness, introducing insubordination, equality and something more.—The Lord Chancellor commented on the absence from the bill of any restraint protecting the wife from herself. He held, for himself, to the old-fashioned notion that the head of the family must be the husband. By the bill the husband remained liable for all his wife's debts except two kinds—namely, debts which she had contracted before marriage, and he was not to be liable in damages for his wife's torits. The inference was that he was to be left responsible in all other respects for her debts. He would not pursue the details of the measure, and he believed that the 10th section of the bill might be made to work out all that was desirable.—Lord Cairns reminded Lord Westbury that every woman in England who had property to her separate use might make contracts, might accept bills of exchange, or buy race-horses if she had a mind to do so, and that every one of those contracts would be valid. He made the same answer to several other objections urged against the bill. It was further stated that the bill contained no provision rendering it obligatory on the wife having property of her own to contribute to the support of her children. But a wife under the bill would be subject to the same obligations in that respect as was now the case. He was not a promoter of the bill, he only had charge of it. Nor was he responsible for many of its provisions. All he desired to do was to secure that wherever property had been acquired by a married woman by virtue of her own industry, be it either bodily or mental, she was entitled to the property so acquired to her separate use, just as if it were settled in the Court of Chancery to her separate use. That he considered the principle of the bill. Some of the provisions he thought unnecessary.—Lord Westbury was quite content with this assurance with regard to the principle of the bill. It was limited to the settlement of property acquired by the woman's own labour, mental and bodily.—The bill was read a second time and referred to a select committee.

The Appellate Jurisdiction Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Felony Bill was read a third time and passed.

June 23.—The Irish Land Bill.—Committee.—Clause 1 (Ulster Custom).—The Duke of Richmond moved an amendment, that the Ulster tenant shall not transfer himself to a subsequent clause unless the Court shall be of opinion that his doing so involves no injustice or breach of contract towards his landlord.—The Lord Chancellor of Ireland (O'Hagan), said the consent of the Court as already provided was enough.—Lords Cairns, Salisbury and Oramore supported the amendment. Lord Westbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Argyll, and Lord Lansdowne, opposed it.—Reserved for consideration in the report.—Clause 2 agreed to, subject to consideration of the amendment in clause 1. Clause 3 (Compensation in absence of custom). An amendment by the Duke of Richmond that the highest scale of compensation should only be given to tenants under £4, instead of £10, and that the amended scale should be—£4 and under, seven years' rent; from £4 to £10, six years'; from £10 to £20, five years'; from £20 to £40, four years'; and the rest according to the Government scale, was carried by a majority of 92 to 71.—Debate adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

June 17.—Unemployed Labour.—Mr. McCullagh Torrens drew attention to the want of employment last winter and feared a recurrence. He wished the question to be considered apart from poor-law and pauperism. He wanted the Government to establish an office where every working man who produced £3 might procure a ticket which would take him to Canada or Australia. The adoption of such a scheme would tend more than anything else to knit together the different portions of the Empire.—Lord G. Hamilton seconded.—Debate adjourned.

June 20.—The Stamp Duty on Leases Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Bridgewater and Beverley Disfranchisement Bill.—The Lords' amendment considered and agreed to.

The Sale of Poisons (Ireland) Bill was recommitted.

The Dividends on Stock Bill passed through committee.

The Salmon Acts Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

June 21.—Bishops in Parliament.—Mr. Beaumont moved for leave to bring in a bill to relieve the bishops from their attendance in the House of Lords.—Mr. Locke King seconded the motion.—Mr. Gladstone opposed it.—Leave was refused by a majority of 158 to 102.

Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Amendment Bill.—Mr. W. Johnstone introduced a bill to alter and amend the law relating to the municipal franchise in Ireland.

June 22.—The Capital Sentences (Court of Appeal) Bill.—Sir G. Jenkinson, moved the second reading. The bill was limited to cases of persons convicted of capital offences where the judge certified for an appeal in the event of his being satisfied upon affidavits either that some facts not brought forward at the trial might, if proved, have obtained an acquittal of the prisoner; or that some facts exculpatory of the prisoner had been discovered since the trial, which, if proved at the trial, might have affected the verdict. He intended to add a third proviso, to the effect that an appeal should lie if the judge were of opinion that circumstances rendered it questionable whether the extreme penalty of the law ought to be carried out. The appeal of a murderer ought to be made to a public tribunal, and not the Home Secretary. In support of this view he quoted the opinions of Sir F. Pollock given before the Criminal Law Commission. Mr. J. D. Lewis moved that the bill be read that say six months. The question, if dealt with, should be dealt with by the ministry. It was not a new one; it had been brought forward in 1844 by Mr. (now Lord Chief Baron) Kelly; in 1848, by Mr. Ewart; and in 1860, by the member for Wexford; when the late Sir G. Lewis made a most exhaustive speech on the whole subject. Besides this, it had been considered by a committee of the House of Lords in 1848, and incidentally by the Capital Punishment Commission, which reported in 1866. Lords Lyndhurst, Denman, and Brougham had declared against it. A written letter was addressed to all the then existing judges for their opinion on the matter, and every single answer was opposed to it. So in 1864, Lord Wensleydale, Mr. Baron Martin, and Sir G. Grey gave their opinion unanimously that such an appeal would be mischievous. The bill was totally unworkable. How was it possible to constitute a court within the conditions prescribed by the bill? Where were the expenses of the appeals to come from? Besides, after all, according to the last clause of the bill, the appeal must ultimately come to the Home Secretary, who would have to decide the case, after two bad trials instead of one good trial.—Mr. Bristowe supported the amendment, because the proposed new tribunal would have nothing more to do than what was done by the Home Secretary at present.—The Attorney-General said the bill failed to grapple with a difficulty which had never yet been grappled with, and that was the difficulty, if a new trial was allowed in criminal as in civil cases, of not allowing it to both parties. The practical effect of the machinery provided by the bill in respect to the constitution of the Court would be to cause great delay in the execution of the sentence, as some of the proposed judges might not be able to attend for a long time after being summoned, and then, after that delay, people would say that it was too late to hang the convict, and, at any rate, capital punishment ought not to be abolished by a side wind of that kind. Assuming, however, that the new Court assembled in good time, still it had not the power to institute a new trial in a regular way before a jury, but could only enter upon a new investigation of a bastard description unknown to the law; and the new Court was afterwards to report to the Queen as to a free pardon, or commutation of the sentence, or otherwise as it might deem right. In fact, the bill placed the judges of the new Court in the position of the Home Secretary, and made them the advisers of the Crown; and here a constitutional objection arose, because it was a constitutional principle that the executive and judicial functions should be kept distinct. Under the existing system the Crown was advised by the Home Secretary as to the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, and the Home Secretary was responsible to Parliament for the advice given. The bill was, therefore, open to the further objection that it made the advisers of the Crown, in respect to the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, a body not responsible to Parliament. At the same time the bill did not relieve the Home Secretary from the duty of advising the Crown in that matter, for that high functionary would still be, after the passing of the bill, as powerful as ever, and might give the Crown whatever advice he pleased with regard to the commutation of capital sentences. The bill was an ill-considered attempt to deal with a complicated subject.—Mr. Lopes said the principle was bad, and the machinery, if possible, worse.—Mr. Bruce commented on the defects of the bill.—The amendment was then agreed to, and the bill rejected.

The Lodgers' Goods Protection Bill was read a second time.

The Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Bill was read a second time.

The Mortgages (No. 2) Bill and the Mortgages (No. 2) Stamp Duty Bill passed through committee.

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI.

May 2.—Schlafrath v. Amb's and Wife.

Married Woman's Separate Property—Liable in Equity for her Debts.

CURRIER, J.—The competency of a married woman to bind her separate property, by giving notes and other obligations, can no longer be regarded as an open question in this State, however unsettled the doctrine may be elsewhere. As to her separate property, she is here regarded as a fiene sole, and, as to that, competent to make contracts, which a court of equity will enforce, not against her personally, but against her separate estate; and not only so, but the contract itself, as, for instance, a promissory note, is evidence of her intention to charge such property. It is sufficient prima facie evidence to establish the existence of such intention, without the introduction of other proofs.

We deduce from the authorities the following conclusions:—

1. That a feme sole may acquire by purchase, as well as by gift, a separate estate, and that, too, through a deed directly to herself, without the intervention of trustees, and that such separate estate will be protected, in equity, against the marital rights of an after-taken husband, who shall acquiesce in the arrangement, and allow his wife to manage and control the property as her own, notwithstanding the marriage.

2. That equity will also subject such estate to the payment of her debts and obligations. When she joins in the execution of a note, it will be inferred that she intended thereby to charge her separate property, without further proof, in the first instance, of such intention. Equity protects the separate interests of a married woman against the claims of her husband and his creditors, but not against the just claims of the creditors of the married woman herself. On the other hand, as already suggested, it will subject such property to the payment of her own debts, and vindicate the rights of those with whom she contracts.

The further point is made that it does not sufficiently appear that the plaintiff has exhausted his legal remedies against the husband, who is a joint maker of the note which is sought to be made good out of his wife's separate estate. The petitioner avers that he has no property whatever, and that fact is admitted by the demurrer. It is not at once perceived what legal redress a creditor can have against a debtor who is destitute of all means of payment. However that may be, this is not a case where the doctrine in regard to the exhaustion of legal remedies applies. This is an equitable proceeding to subject the separate estate of Mrs. Amb's to the payment of her note, by the execution of which she is presumed to have intended a charge upon such separate property. As against this property the plaintiff had no legal remedy. The jurisdiction of chancery to subject it to the payment of her debts is in no way dependent upon antecedent legal proceedings of any kind. The plaintiff never had any legal remedy against Mrs. Amb's or her property. His first and only remedy was in chancery.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

SUPREME CONSULAR COURT.

(Before Sir PHILIP FRANCIS, Knt., Judge.)

May 23.—In re Poscher v. Valsamachy.

Personal Liability of Practitioners.

In this case Mr. M'Coan, barrister, the plaintiff's advocate, had given an undertaking to pay into court a sum of £20 on account of the defendant's costs in the action. An order had been made by the Court calling on Mr. M'Coan to pay this sum, the order being endorsed in the usual manner with a memorandum to the effect that if the order were disobeyed he (Mr. M'Coan) would be liable to an execution levied on his goods. Mr. M'Coan had obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to show cause why this order should not be set aside.

Mr. Harvey (solicitor), the defendant's advocate, now showed cause against the rule. He argued that in that court there was no distinction between barristers and attorneys or solicitors; consequently Mr. M'Coan was personally liable on the undertaking given in this case, and the case was exactly that of an attorney, who by the English law was liable to attachment if he disobeyed an order of Court. He cited Re M'Dermott, L. R. 1 P. C. 267; Patterson on Common Law (ed. 1857), 1243, 1244; Re Wallace, 15 W. R. 533.

Mr. M'Coan, contra, said that he opposed the order as a matter of principle. He admitted that he himself, like other barristers practising in that court, practised both as barrister and attorney; but he contended nevertheless that the distinction between barrister and attorney was not lost, and that consequently he, as a barrister, incurred no personal responsibility on any undertaking given on behalf of his client.

THE JUDGE.—We have to decide a point which I thought had been by the practice of this court already decided, but of which probably we have no record, and that is the position of practitioners in this court. It is urged that, an attorney practising as a counsel and a counsel practising as an attorney, they have both the same liabilities and the same advantages. Now, I have no doubt whatever that the practice has been for practitioners here to be in the same position whether they are attorneys or counsel. It would be impossible to carry on the business of this court with the limited bar we have if that rule, which obtains in the colonies and elsewhere, were not adopted. It has been adopted, and with very beneficial results; and for the first time I now hear to-day that a barrister-at-law making an engagement in court or in chambers is in a different position to an attorney who had made a similar engagement. I wish, therefore, to repeat distinctly what I said before, when the rule nisi was obtained, that barristers and attorneys have in this court, and must have from the nature of things, the same liabilities and the same duties. We know perfectly well what the distinction is between these two divisions of lawyers in England and Ireland—a division of duties which works well there, but which would not work well here—which could not work well here. Barristers out here perform all the functions of attorneys. They take out summonses, take the evidence of witnesses, pay fees, and do all those things which are usually done by attorneys and attorneys' clerks in England, and that without the slightest degradation or derogation to their character. In the same way we listen to solicitors practising in this court with the same deference and the same pleasure that we do to learned counsel, and there is no distinction whatever between the two orders of the profession which I have ever heard made in this court, or which I am inclined to make in this court, unless instructed from higher quarters. Then we come to the real question of fact. . . . If such an engagement had been made by an attorney—by Mr. Harvey, or any other gentleman practising here as an attorney—there could not be a doubt for one moment that he would have been held personally responsible for its fulfilment. I do not think it would have been attempted to have disputed it. As I have already said, the position of a barrister and an attorney in this court is the same. It appears to me an inevitable conclusion that practitioners in this court, whether barristers or solicitors, making such an engagement, must be held to it. There was nothing offensive as coming from this Court in insisting on such a course. It is due to the Court, it is due to the rest of the practitioners, it is due to the public. The only thing I am astonished at is that what I conceive to be such a well-recognised fact as that of the merged condition of the character of attorney and counsel in this court should be now disputed, and that after such an arrangement in my chambers with me, and such an undertaking publicly made in court afterwards, the matter should be disputed at all. I insist, therefore, upon the original order being carried out, because I think it is due to the Court, due to the practitioners of this court, whether counsel or attorneys, that as a matter of justice such an engagement made in such a way should be carefully, faithfully, and anxiously fulfilled. Therefore this rule will be discharged.

Rule nisi discharged accordingly, and with costs against Mr. M'Coan.

(Abridged from the Levant Times.)

OBITUARY.

MR. J. A. DORANT.

Mr. James Annesley Dorant, solicitor, of St. Albans, Herts, died at Abbey Cottage on the 1st of June, at the age of eighty years. He was certificated in 1813, and for upwards of half a century served as Deputy Clerk of the Peace for the county of Herts and liberty of St. Albans; he was also clerk to the commissioners of taxes for the hundred of Cashio.

MR. R. G. TUCKER.

Mr. Richard Grant Tucker, solicitor, died at St. Peter-street, Tiverton, on the 12th June. He was admitted in Michaelmas Term, 1840, and filled the office of clerk to the land, assessed, and property tax commissioners of Tiverton, which office becomes vacant by his death. He was also vestry clerk and clerk to the burial board, and acted as agent to the Imperial Fire and Life Assurance Company.

MR. J. ANDREWS.

Mr. John Andrews, a retired solicitor, of Modbury, Devonshire, died at that place on the 12th of June, at the advanced age of 83 years. He retired from practice several years ago, but continued to take an active interest in the local affairs of Modbury, in which and the neighbouring parishes he owned considerable property. On his retirement, he was succeeded in his practice by his son, Mr. Richard Andrews.

MR. D. D. KEANE, Q.C.

Mr. David Deady Keane, Q.C., Recorder of Bedford, died on the 20th of June, in the sixtieth year of his age. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and afterwards proceeded to the German University of Göttingen, where he graduated Ph. D. in 1831. He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1835, and soon after joined the Norfolk Circuit. Mr. Keane first acquired a reputation for his knowledge of the law relating to the constitution, powers, and duties of parochial and other local bodies. He was a revising barrister on this circuit from 1856 till 1863, and became Recorder of Bedford in July, 1861, in succession to Sir Richard Couch, appointed to a judgeship at Bombay. In early life he was a Parliamentary reporter, and after being called to the bar he acted as reporter in the Court of Queen's Bench. He published several legal works, among which may be mentioned "A Collection of all the Statutes and Parts of Statutes now in force relating to Gaols and Houses of Correction in England and Wales," "The Nuisances Removal Acts for England and Wales, with Analysis, &c.;" and "Reports of Cases in the Common Pleas on Appeals from the Decisions of the Revising Barristers from 1854 to 1862." In July, 1865, he unsuccessfully contested Beverley. Mr. Keane married, in 1849, Julia, youngest daughter of Dr. Marshall, by whom he had one son and three daughters.

MR. THOMAS DARWELL.

We printed last week a short notice of the lamented death of this gentleman. We now extract from the Manchester Courier the following obituary, written by an intimate friend of Mr. Darwell:—"Mr. Darwell was a native of this city (Manchester). He was of an old Manchester family, and an account of his father and grandfather, the former of whom was educated at the Manchester Free Grammar School, will be found in the second volume of the Grammar School Register, published by the Chetham Society, p. 61. Mr. Thos. Darwell, the second son of his father, was educated for the legal profession, under Mr. Bellenden Ker, as conveyancer, and Mr. Joseph Brown, Q.C., as special pleader, and was admitted as an attorney in 1840. He became in the same year a partner in the firm of Cooke & Beever, in which he had served his articles of clerkship—an office of old standing in Salford, and which may be traced back, we believe, through a regular professional succession for a period of upwards of a century and a-half. It was subsequently removed to Princess-street, and later to John Dalton-street, the existing firm being Beever, Darwell, & Taylor. Mr. Darwell's professional acquirements, sound practical sense and judgment very soon gave him a distinguished position as a solicitor, and established a basis of general confidence with all who employed him, which was never shaken or impaired during his life-time. He devoted himself unremittingly to the business of his clients, and allowed no consideration to interfere with the discharge of his duties in connection with the varied and very important interests which he was called upon to watch over and attend to. The patient, orderly, and systematic manner in which he transacted business, and the quiet self-possession and intelligence which he uniformly displayed—never saying one word more than was strictly necessary in its progress—all those who were brought into contact with him will well remember. There may have been solicitors of more brilliant talents, of larger mental cultivation, and of more profound legal learning, but it may be doubted whether there has been one in this locality in whose integrity, discretion, tact, and good sense a stronger reliance has been felt. He was, in fact, made to be trusted. Accordingly he was placed in situations of high responsibility, to fill which well qualities of no ordinary kind are required, and he never disappointed expectation. He succeeded Mr. Cooke as the adviser, on behalf of the firm, of the feoffees of Chetham's Hospital, by whom he was much valued and respected; was the secretary and receiver to Hulme's trustees, being appointed in October, 1841, and occupied other situations of like character and importance, besides superintending the management of large estates of private clients. By all whose professional interests he attended to will his loss be felt, and personally and socially his departure will cause deep and sincere regret. Though not an active politician—for he devoted himself entirely to his profession—he was a consistent Conservative, and an attached member of the Church of England. In private life his habits were retiring and unobtrusive, but no one enjoyed more the society of a few select friends when the exacting calls of business allowed him an opportunity. Kindly in disposition and disposed at all times to assist others he was never wanting in counsel and sympathy, and he was liberal and charitable, without parade or ostentation, to an extent of which only those who were on the most intimate terms with him could form any idea. Mr. Darwell had for some time been suffering under an insidious complaint, which he had attempted to subdue by temporary absence from home and relief from the cares of business, but on his return he sunk under it on the 13th instant, at the comparatively-speaking early age of 53. He was a bachelor, and his nearest relations are nephews and nieces. . . . It may be added, in conclusion, that Mr. Darwell was some time controller of the Chancery Court of Lancashire, a director of the Manchester Exchange, and a trustee of Owen's College. He has left legacies in his will to the Solicitors' Benevolent society, of which he was a member, and to the Manchester Law Clerks Friendly Society. He was a member of the Manchester Law Association, and the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association." The legacies are £90 free of duty to each society.

COURT PAPERS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

ORDER OF COURT.

Whereas, it is proper that the accounts kept by the Accountant-General of this court should be examined and compared, in order to settle the same, and whereas it will require considerable time to perfect such examination, and it is necessary that a time should be appointed for closing the books of accounts of the said Accountant-General for the purposes aforesaid, I do order that the books of the said Accountant-General be closed from and after Friday, the 19th day of August next, to Friday, the 28th day of October next inclusive, excepting upon the days and for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, in order to adjust the accounts of the suitors with the books kept at the bank; and that during that time no draft for any money, except as hereinafter provided, or certificate for any effects under the care and direction of this Court, be signed or delivered out by the Accountant-General, or any stocks or annuities accepted or transferred by him relating to the suitors of this court; and that no purchase, sale, or transfer be made by the said Accountant-General, unless the order and request or registrar's certificate be left at his office on or before Saturday, the 6th day of August next; and that no order for payment of any money out of court which may then be in court be received in the Accountant-General's office after Tuesday, the 9th day of August next, provided nevertheless that the office of the said Accountant-General shall be open on Friday, the 7th, Saturday, the 8th, and Monday, the 10th days of October next, for the delivery out of any regular interest drafts which may have become payable in respect of the October dividends, and of any other regular interest drafts which have become payable prior to or during the closing of the office aforesaid. And to the end that the suitors may have notice hereof, and apply to the court as there shall be occasion to have money paid to them out of the bank, or stocks or annuities transferred to them before the 19th day of August next, I do order that this order be entered and set up in the several offices of this court.

LANCASHIRE SUMMER ASSIZES, 1870.

The commissions for holding these assizes will be opened at Lancaster, on Tuesday, the 26th of July, at Manchester, on Saturday the 30th of July, and at Liverpool, on Saturday the 13th of August.

The entry of causes at Lancaster will commence immediately after the opening of the commissions, on Tuesday the 26th of July, and will close at nine o'clock on the following morning.

By an order made by the judges at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, 1868, "for facilitating the entry of causes for trial at future assizes for the Southern division of this county, and for the more convenient arrangement of the business of such assizes." [See 13 Sol. Jour. 62.]

Causes for trial at Manchester and Liverpool can be entered provisionally at the office of the Prothonotary of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster at Preston, as follows, viz.: Causes for trial at Manchester, on Monday, the 25th of July and daily thereafter, until Thursday, the 28th of July, inclusive, between the hours of ten o'clock in the forenoon and four o'clock in the afternoon; and causes for trial at Liverpool, on Monday, the 8th of August, and daily thereafter until Thursday, the 11th of August inclusive, between the above-mentioned hours.

The entry of causes at Manchester and Liverpool respectively, will commence at the assize courts, Manchester, and St. George's Hall, Liverpool, immediately after the opening of the commissions, and will close at nine o'clock in the evening on the commission day.

The court will sit at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, at Manchester and Liverpool respectively, on the Monday next following the commission day.

The trial of special jury causes will commence at Manchester, at ten o'clock, a.m. on Thursday, the 4th of August, and at Liverpool at ten o'clock a.m., on Thursday, the 18th of August, and not earlier, unless the court shall otherwise order.

A list of causes for trial at Manchester and Liverpool respectively, each day (except the first) will be exhibited in the corridor of the court and in the library.

Lord O'Hagan, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, took his seat in the House of Peers on the 21st June. His Lordship was, in early life, a student at the chambers of Mr. Thomas Chitty, of the Middle Temple, and was connected with an Irish provincial newspaper while pursuing his legal studies in London.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Consols went up as soon as the rain came down, and were very brisk until a fall on the French Bourse occasioned a relapse; since then they have been exceedingly heavy. In the railway market Metropolitans were in great request early in the week; subsequently some fluctuations took place in Great Northern, North Easterns, and Sheffield's, in consequence of speculations as to the probable results of the late accident; the latter stocks recovered on an intimation that so far as the Clearing-house rules affect the case, that company was exonerated. On the whole the railway market closes heavily. Foreign securities are particularly so, though several new loans have been well taken up.

At the first meeting of the creditors under the bankruptcy of Mr. W. H. Cotterill, solicitor, Mr. James Waddell, accountant, was appointed trustee. Solicitors, Messrs. Linklaters, Blackwood, and Co. The liabilities were stated to be about £150,000, and scarcely any assets.

At a meeting of the Law Life Assurance Society, held on the 18th June, the report of the directors was unanimously adopted. It stated that the total assets of the company, including both the guarantee and assurance funds, amounted, on the 31st December last, to £5,537,281 ls. 11d., and that the number of policies remaining in force was 6,887, assuring £8,578,390, with reversionary bonuses amounting to £1,671,574—making the sum at risk on that day £10,249,964.

Mr. Tillet, solicitor, of Norwich, is again a candidate for the parliamentary representation of that city.

Mr. William Enfield, solicitor, has resigned the office of Town Clerk of Nottingham, which he had held for more than twenty years. He was admitted in 1823.

The Sunderland Town Council are seriously discussing the question of appointing a stipendiary magistrate for that borough. The cost of the appointment has been set down at £1,000 per annum.

Mr. George Ebenezer Shirley, for many years clerk to Messrs. Essell & Co., solicitors, of Rochester, died at the Barming Lunatic Asylum on the 3rd of June. He had formerly been private tutor to Lord Stanley, now Earl of Derby. He was author of "The Old Bridge" (Rochester) and other poems, original and translated. He had also published translations from Aristophanes and other Greek writers. He likewise frequently translated from the German.

The family of the late Mr. A. W. Aikman, Crown Solicitor of Jamaica, have recovered, in a trial before the Chief Justice of Jamaica and a special jury, the sum of £6,000 damages (and costs) from the Jamaica Railway Company on account of Mr. Aikman's death by a collision on that line.

Two Chicago "divorce lawyers" and their client have been sent to jail for sixty days for conspiring to obtain a divorce without publication.

An enterprising American lawyer proposes to clear a murderer by proving that his father was once insane.
